AN INTERCEPTED LETTER.

[It is usually and justly considered unfair to publish private correspondence, but the following letter fell into our possession in a manner so extraordinary that a suppression of it would look like an attempt to thwart the decrees of Fate. How it fell into our possession it is not necessary that we relate; it is sufficient to say that in this case, at least, the Post-office is not blamable. Evidently it is from one young lady to another, and of its genuineness there can be no doubt, the delicate thread-work of foreign languages and the italic tallies where ever a point is made being all as so many broad seals to attest its authenticity. Of course we do not understand in all cases the author's exact meaning, but we print the letter as it is written, trusting that she is not personal and hoping that no one will be bit. We have fairly tapped the correspondence, and other letters may be expected.]

SAN FRANCISCO, November 29, 1864.

WILL you believe me, caressima, that this is the first moment I can honestly claim as entirely my own since my arrival in this gay metropolis? I feel confident that you will attribute my silence to what you persistently term my spirit of procrastination; but, m'amie, you are at fault this time. Of course I remember having promised to give you a description in detail of my visit to San Francisco: what I saw, what I did, what was said, and who said it; but one day you will yourself be obliged to confess that a promise made in the country and kept in the city is a sort of rara avis, and that it requires an exceedingly well-balanced mind to retain its equilibrium when overwhelmed as I have been by the kind attention of my many good friends, who regard me as a species of involuntary exile and treat me accordingly. I have been in a perfect whirl of excitement for the first few days, and consequently have not had time to attend to anybody's business except my own. Do not now, I beg, reject my letter with an ejaculation of supreme contempt, but with your usual serene disposition bear with my prolixity.

To-day is perfectly glorious, and I have just returned from a delightful drive to Black Point, where I met and was introduced to your friend Capt. —, who is, as you have frequently described him, a model of rhetorical excellence, and fully convinced of his own importance, but withal hospitable, and, I understand, a very efficient officer.

Speaking of officers, I was told, to-day, of the promotion of one of whom you have repeatedly heard me speak as being such a very "nice gentleman." Your fertile imagination has doubtless already suggested to whom I refer. I will remark, en passant, that I sincerely trust the old adage of "honores mutant mores" may not be verified in this instance, for then the "nice gentleman" might descend to the level of a VAIN BOAST. How can I thank you sufficiently for the introduction to your bon ami of the uncommon cognomen? He has contributed more to my amusement during my sojourn in the city than "any other man." In a word, he is charming. With an interminable fund of anecdote always at his command, he possesses the essential commodity of an excellent memory which prevents him from ever inflicting upon his hearers the same story twice. (?)

I hope you will not be pained to learn that they tell some very funny tales about him; but, between you and me, I do not believe he is half as naughty as the over-scrupulous credit to his account. If he is, he must certainly adopt the suaviter in modo, fortiter in re style, for one could never be so mild and yet so wicked. Mrs. — told me, in her customary confidential manner, that he is an ardent admirer of Parisienne beauties. Well, who has a better right than he, when, after having seen the natural productions of almost every other known country, he chooses to become a votary of Paris? I think it proves conclusively his superior taste. We have, however, learned not to give credence to all the reports emanating from Mrs. —, as she is dreadfully spiteful, you know; and why I cannot conceive, for although at present laboring under the disadvantages of a state of impecuniosity, she is refreshingly respectable.

Among the current items of the day I know of none, with the exception of two sad departures from among our midst. They were both of the gentler sex; but one left for France in the English style and the other for England, (or elsewhere,) taking "French leave." At this moment a verse of Scott presents itself forcibly to my mind. I will give it to you as near as I can remember:

"The day was long, the wind was cold,
The minstrel was infirm and old."

O tempora, O mores! The morals of the inhabitants of this gay Elysium I fear are becoming slightly equivocal, mildly speaking; but then I, who am verging towards the "venomous astringency of ancient maidenhood," must not be too severe with my younger friends, for rashness, you know, is the error of youth; so I content myself by telling them that they have only to be virtuous and they'll be proportionately happy. But I will remark, without any malice, however, that if this same rashness were to confine itself simply to juveniles instead of attacking so virulently the more mature portion of the community, we would immediately perceive beneficial results; but "to err is human," so we poor mortals must not assume too boldly the character of censors.

As for the theatres, I am fearful my account of them will not prove at all gratifying, having only been twice—mirabile dictu! As I had feared, I was almost too late for the Keans, only seeing them once before their departure; but they, appreciating Shakspeare thoroughly in every point, intend that we shall understand how sweet a sorrow is parting, and so, like Paul Julien, will give us another series of farewell entertainments prior to their leaving our shores forever.

My second visit to a theatre was to witness the grand spectacular representation of the Siege of Troy. I had anticipated a rare, classical treat; but, ma chérie, the expectation was nothing to the realization, for in one short hour I had a satiety of all classics, both ancient and modern. To attempt to criticise the performance would be simply ridiculous, after the many laudable and erudite critiques of the daily papers. Suffice it, then, to say that the feminine portion of the dramatis personæ were not exactly in puris naturalibus, but as near it as was warmly convenient. I noticed among the highly "appreciative" audience many of our first citizens and also a few of our last—one in particular, who, they tell me, is one of the largest stock-holders in the establishment. But that peut-être is like many other on-dits, entirely unreliable.

There was a delightful soirée dansante at the "Cosmopolitan," last evening. I was there, of course, but appeared particularly meek and lowly, surrounded as I was by the resplendent toilettes of the wives of our Washoe princes. If our new State, in its youth, sends forth such brilliant representatives, what may we not expect when it arrives at the years of discretion?

Before bidding you good-by, ma petite, I must assure you that I have attended faithfully to your commission regarding THE CALIFORNIAN: it will be forwarded regularly to your address. If any of our acquaintances in M— desire a similar favor, let me know, and I will attend to it immediately, as I quite like to meet the affable and gentlemanly proprietors. This of course is strictly entre nous. Do not permit any time to elapse before answering my letter. I do so long to hear from you.

Toule à vous,

BELLA DONNA.

THINGS.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, December 3d, 1864.

WE have had a few drops of rain during the week—a slight shower—which commenced on Wednesday of last week and has not quite ended yet. I hope that the people who for a year past have been clamoring for rains are satisfied now.

The Irish Giant is satisfied, if no one else is. He was drowned Tuesday morning in attempting to wade from a cheap restaurant on Montgomery street to the Bank Exchange. His boots are on exhibition at John Parrott's banking-house, where the Dwarf succeeded in getting them discounted after convincing the head of the establishment that they were not hams.

Had I not stirred out of the house during the week, I should still have known that water had at last come, by the milk at breakfast. Once more it has assumed that beautiful blue which I once thought it borrowed from the milkmaid's eyes, but which my riper experience leads me to believe is principally prompted by the pump.

The vision of my youth is dispelled; I know now what "milk made" means, for I've seen the proprietor of a ranch making it—chalk and water are the principal ingredients. It is well enough to introduce the milk-maid in Bucolics, but made milk would be a nearer approach to what we have at breakfast-tables.

The miners are glad of the rain, too, and are panning out nearly as richly and industriously as the milkmen.

It is unfair to say that any one of the Lincoln Electors is dissatisfied with the weather. It is true that they intend to go to Washington, but the rain will not at all interfere with the journey, as they purpose to go by water. I know one of the party who will go by water, sure—he always goes by it, but no one ever knew him to pass anything stronger.

Umbrellas have gone up. I bought a new one the first day of the rain and it went up the first night, while the owner was at late lunch. I haven't seen it since, and do not know that I would recognize it if I did. It was not in my possession long enough to enable me to give a description of it, but I'm ready to pay a reward of a dollar or two to any honest man who will leave a good silk umbrella at this office—whether it be mine or not.

If put upon the witness-stand and asked to swear a great oath, I could not conscientiously say that I like rain. I should not like to be dry if there was nothing to drink around, but I have constitutional objections to being very wet at any time. Had I been born a fish I should have been unhappy indeed; pitying mermaids would have beheld in me the most miserable monster that swam the deep.

Particularly I would have disliked to be a perch, for then birds might have been tempted to light on me. Perhaps you've noticed that a bird lighting on a fish bears no small analogy to a squatter settling on the Potrero—it doesn't hurt the bird at all, but the fish is suddenly taken out of market.

If I had to be a fish, and it were optional with me what fish to be, I think "I'd like to be an angel"—I mean, an Angel Fish. For in an article in last week's CALIFORNIAN from an English magazine, headed "Remarkable Cases of Obesity," I remember to have read that the Roman ladies were accustomed to apply the flesh of that fish to their bosoms, to prevent a too voluminous development. Decidedly I should prefer an outside place to an in, and that same Angel is the only fish I know of that manages to obtain one. On the whole, I don't know but what I'd be considerably happier as a fish than as a man. Wet feet wouldn't trouble me; and though my life might terminate in a sudden broil, I wouldn't be kept in hot water all the time. It would be pleasant to be a fish at Grass Valley, because it showers angle-worms there, and to fish those would be manna in a manner. Falling on ploughed ground up there, though, I should think those same worms would be apt to stick in the people's crops.

But I am warned to cut myself down to a column this week, on account of a space being wanted for some Bella Donna. Bella Donna and Nightshade in Botany are the same thing, and behold I am this night thrown into the shade and in a measure sent to Botany Bay—so like a queer fish I put a fin-is to this article and the seal of INIGO.

NORTHWARD.

FAR to the North, where giant pines are sifting
The feathery snow-flakes through their thread-like leaves,
Down a long lane, where heap on heap is drifting,
And snow-birds twitter wintery melodies;

In the old homestead sits my brown-eyed mother;
A merry little boy is in her lap,
Now trying, with kisses sweet, her breath to smother,
And now to tear the white strings from her cap;

Anon, to pull the needles from her stocking
As absently and thoughtfully she knits,
And darting now, with blue eye full of mocking,
To climb the chair where white-haired grandpa sits;

Putting his wee white fingers in the wrinkles,
Peering into the furrows curiously,
Trying to catch the funny, dancing twinkles
That bubble in the corner of his eye;

Examining the queer mouth, wide with laughing,
As an adventurer explores a chasm,
Wondering if the lost pearls were drowned in quaffing,
Or overturned by some internal spasm;

Wondering in many childish ways, and may be Sage thoughts have entered in the little brain,
How the old man was once like him, a baby,
And being old, he grew a child again.

How once this sweet vale was an Indian valley,
Where painted warriors rode with savage grace;
And once this old dame was the winsome Sally,
With laughing eyes and cherry-blossom face.

And here he wooed and won the child-like maiden—
How strange it seems!—for three score years a wife,
Like a great flower, with wondrous incense laden,
Blessing the long, long summer of his life.

But now, as daintily upon life's ladder
The fearless baby-feet so gaily climb;
Their steps are slower, and their thoughts are sadder,
Under the shadows of the hill of Time.

They have seen sunny hours and wintry weather,
And old friends gathered to the earth's kind breast;
And still they linger on the way together,
Nearer, each day, to the Eternal Rest.

Their wise words on this rosy childhood dropping,
As on the May's delightful blossoming
Fall gentle snow-showers—for amoment stopping
The bright career of the ecstatic Spring.

And as the child bonds gladly to the Summer,
Dancing on roses, to joy's melody;
The angels wait, for a belated corner,
Ah! which of my beloved ones will it be?

EMILIE LAWSON.

A NEW VERSION OF THE "TICKET OF LEAVE MAN" PLAY.

IN a quiet street of the Marais—which is the Sleepy Hollow of Paris—lives a retired tradesman who has accumulated a respectable competency of fortune, say $60,000, by selling sugar moulds. He had one child, a daughter, who had grown up to the eve of womanhood. On the same floor with him and his family lived a handsome young fellow of five-and-twenty, with dainty black moustaches and a pair of blue eyes, such as an artist would endow Innocence or hope withal. He dressed well, too. The two neighbors met every day on the staircase. By and by they bowed when they met. One day a little incident occurred which led to conversation, this superinduced something else, which in turn brought to pass something else still, until the concatenation of circumstances ended in seeing the young man introduced into the drawing-room of the retired sugar-mould dealer. Their acquaintance gradually ripened into a sort of intimacy around the table where chess and draughts and backgammon were played, especially as the young man (though passionately fond of all these innocent games) contrived never to win a cent, but left some of his money in the hands of his hosts. The heiress of the house, accustomed to see no other young man, soon became touched by her young neighbor, and the parents were not averse from a marriage between them. Nevertheless the subject had never been broached until one evening the young man forgot behind him several letters, which seemed to have slipped from his pocket. As Frenchmen have no delicacy whatsoever, the family read these letters. You may judge the contents of them all by one of them:

"TOULON, June 18, 1864.

"MY DEAR NEPHEW—I did not send you to Paris for you to be guilty of nonsense. Your last letters are filled with the details of a petty romance, which I dare say boarding school girls would deem very touching—you have begun to read with a little girl named Celeste. I am no boarding-school girl, and I do not fancy nonsense. I have not laid up $200,000 by Indian voyages these twenty years gone to see my nephew and only heir, with his aristocratic appearance and name, marry a Mlle. Celeste, the daughter of a dealer in sugar-moulds. Do not mention that girl's name to me again, or I shall be very angry with you. Remember that I am to you just what my poor brother that is dead and gone was—your father, and he, as you well know, would never have allowed you to be guilty of any such stupid proceeding.

"Your affectionate uncle, GEORGES DE R——."

The next morning the young fellow (his name was Ernest) returned apparently very uneasy. He said he had left some letters behind him, he believed there, and inquired if they had seen them. The sugar-mould dealer confessed his indiscretion and bade Ernest break relations with them as it was evident from those letters that he could never marry Celeste. This summons seemed to throw the young man into deep despair. He replied: "Wait a little longer and I will endeavor to change my uncle's resolution, for I feel that if I do not I shall die." The sugar-mould dealer said: "I will wait," for the truth was he desired to marry his daughter to the young man who seemed to possess every quality that a reasonable father-in-law could ask for in a son. Several weeks passed away, when one morning Ernest ran joyously into his neighbor's drawing-room holding in his hand a letter post-marked Toulon, and from the uncle who came so near shipwrecking his happiness. The letter ran:

"MY DEAR NEPHEW—As far as your marriage is concerned, do as you please. I only wished to test your affection and to be sure that your sentiments for Mlle. Celeste was no caprice but real love. Time has proved your affection to be sincere. Marry her. I do not know whether my gout will allow me to go up to Paris for your wedding; but at all events I shall engage one of my friends to give you everything necessary to enable you to marry yourself decently. If I am unable to go up to Paris to your wedding you must spend your honeymoon here. To see you happy will rejuvenate me."

This letter satisfied Celeste's father, and the wedding day was fixed. Ernest refused to have a marriage contract; he wanted everything he had to belong to his wife. Celeste's father-in-law went several times with Eugene to the notary who had the money sent up by the Toulon uncle, but he was discreet enough to remain at the door outside while his future son-in-law was transacting the business. At last all the papers required by the French law were received; the certificate of birth bore an honorable name. The banns were published at the Mayor's office and church and the wedding feast ordered. Everything was ready—but the uncle wrote that he had such a violent attack of the gout that it was utterly impossible for him to leave his chamber. It became necessary to dispense with the uncle's presence. Misfortune never comes alone! On the wedding day Ernest experienced additional ill luck; his two groomsmen and his tailor disappointed him; but the tailor was one of the great tailors of Paris, who are always overwhelmed with work, he of course could not be expected to be punctual; besides, have not all tailors a charter which enables them to accompany all of their promises with a mental reservation? At the last moment the clothes came; the absent groomsmen's places were taken by kinsmen of the bride. They went to the mayor's office and to the church: the civil and ecclesiastical "yes" were uttered by both parties: mayor and priest proclaimed them man and wife. Then the marriage feast was spread in a restaurant on the boulevard, which was followed by a ball. Although it was midnight when the bridal pair retired, the husband was such an active, industrious fellow that by six o'clock in the morning he was dressed and out attending to important business for his uncle. At nine o'clock the mantua-maker called to present her bill for the wedding clothes. Celeste's mother went to the drawer where she had laid the money for all the wedding expenses—not a cent could she find there. She asked her husband to go into the bridal chamber across the landing to get Ernest to lend her the money to avoid making the mantua-maker return. He found Ernest had gone out and poor Celeste over head and ears in bills sent in by the tradesmen from whom Ernest had bought the wedding presents, and among them was one bill of which she could make nothing: it was the bill of an old-clo' dealer for the "loan of a wedding suit." As Ernest could not be gone long, all inquiries were postponed for the present; but twelve o'clock came without bringing Ernest. One o'clock—no Ernest. Two o'clock—no Ernest. You may imagine how Celeste wept. Three o'clock—no Ernest; but it brought an old friend of the family who had just discovered—unfortunately twenty-seven hours too late—that Ernest was a ticket-of-leave man, who had been sent to the hulks for forgery and swindling; that he had that morning drawn all his wife's money and had taken the Havre steamship for New York! It was he who had robbed his father-in-law's house before the family were up. He carried off some $25,000 or $50,000 in gold with him. Suit has been brought by the family to annul the marriage, and in the course of the trial all the above facts came out in evidence. The uncle at Toulon was a ticket-of-leave man, who for $1,000 had played a part in the comedy—"Spiridon," in the Boston Saturday Gazette.

BOUND VOLUMES OF THE CALIFORNIAN.—Those wishing bound copies of the First Volume of THE CALIFORNIAN can procure them by leaving their orders at this office. The convenient form in which THE CALIFORNIAN is published, and the varied nature of its contents eminently fit it for preservation. In the current volume will be found the only English translation of La Comtesse Diane—the most brilliant of Mario Uehard's romances; also the story of Annie and her Master, one of the most charming and delicate stories ever published in any language; the romance of Mary Stuart and Chastelar—a thrilling reminiscence of Scotland's fair young Queen and her poet lover; and the Notting Hill Mystery, showing the unravelling of a terrible thread of crime strikingly analogous in all its salient details to the crime of La Pommerais, the French poisoner, whose late trial and execution are still fresh in the minds of all readers. This volume contains 432 pages. Subscribers for a bound copy can have their names handsomely lettered in gold upon the volume, and the book will be delivered at their residences on leaving their order and address.

HE LIKES A GLASS OF GOOD BEER.—Thackeray, being told that an acquaintance of his, who was notorious for his love of beer, had sailed for India, replied, "He was a good fellow. Take him for half-and-half, we shall not look upon his like again!"

THE DIAMOND BRACELETS.

THE evening of the 15th February, 183—, was a gala night in Paris. Don Giovanni was to be performed at the opera by an assemblage of talent rarely announced for one night, even at the opera-house of Paris or in the great opera of Don Giovanni. Yet it was not the names of the artistes that most attracted the attention as one read the bills—nobler and more celebrated names caught the eye. They were those of the reigning king and queen—Louis Philippe and Marie Amélie. The offices announced that they would honor the opera with their presence on that evening. They had been but a short time restored to their native land, and this was their first appearance at the opera since the "three days" of July had placed them on the throne; for this reason as many Orleansists as could obtain tickets had secured them for the opera of the 15th February, to hear Don Giovanni and to see their king and queen. About six o'clock carriages were to be seen conveying their gayly-dressed occupants to the classic building. An unusually handsome equipage stood at the door of a large house in the Rue des Champs-Élysées, evidently also for the purpose of taking some fashionables to the opera. This carriage and house belonged to the Baron de V——, who was just then standing at the bottom of the noble staircase inside the mansion, calling playfully to his wife, telling her that the carriage was waiting.

"I'm coming, I'm coming," was the answer to this appeal; "don't be in such a hurry!"

As the last piece of advice was proffered the speaker appeared at the top of the stairs.

She was a dark beauty of about one and twenty, and was dressed purely in white. She came fluttering down stairs, chattering meanwhile to her handsome husband, who stood looking admiringly at her.

"Now I'm quite ready, so please don't scold. I've only got my bracelets to put on, and those I want you to clasp for me. Here's the case, if you'll take them out, and here's my wrist. Now, suppose I were to lose them in the crowd, what would our good mother say?"

A smile was the only answer the baron vouchsafed, as he took the bracelets out of their case and clasped them on the fair white arm of his bride.

They were very costly, being each composed of three rows of valuable table diamonds, while in the centre of either glittered a spray of heart's-ease, artistically formed of smaller diamonds. The bracelets were rendered more precious to their possessors by the fact of their having been in the DeV—— family for three generations. They now by right belonged to the dowager baronne, but she had insisted upon giving them to her son for his bride, who therefore wore them on such occasions as the one we are describing.

The Baron and Baronne de V—— stepped into their carriage, and in a few minutes were entering their box at the opera. The house was already full, although it still wanted fifteen minutes to the time announced for the overture to begin. At length the members of the orchestra took their places, and the peculiar, subdued sound of tuning stringed instruments was heard. Still the royal box was empty, and all eyes were turned toward it in eager expectation. In another moment applause burst from the pit and gallery and the entire house, as Louis Philippe and Queen Marie Amélie attended by a large suite of officers and ladies and gentlemen of the court, appeared. The king and queen bowed graciously in return for the homage paid them, and then took their seats; at which the rest of the company did the same, and the overture commenced.

The queen looked unusually happy, and seemed to take a lively interest in all around her. She not only gazed at the stage, but the boxes also came in for a share of her penetrating observation.

Suddenly she bent slightly forward and looked in the direction of the box that contained the lovely young Baronne de V——. The latter was leaning forward, her right hand raised, a finger of which touched one of her dimpled cheeks, deeply interested in the fate of "Don Giovanni," and quite absorbed in the beautiful music.

Her husband had noticed the queen's gesture, and was aware that she had observed his wife, and when the queen turned away he laughingly told her of it.

"Nonsense!" cried the bride; "don't fancy such absurdities."

The truth of what her husband had said, however, soon forced itself on her mind, for at that moment an officer, dressed in the same uniform as those attending the royal party, drew back the curtain behind their box, and stepping forward, said: "Pardon, madame, but her Majesty's admiration and curiosity has been so roused by the sight of the beautiful bracelets you wear that she has commissioned me to come and request you spare one for a few moments for her closer inspection." The pretty baronne blushed, looked up to her husband for his approval, then unclasped one of the bracelets and handed it to the officer, feeling not a little flattered at the attention and distinction the queen had conferred on her.

The last act of the opera began, and at length the last scene ended, yet the bracelet was not returned. Its owners thought the officer had doubtless forgotten it, and the baron said he would go and make inquiries concerning it. He did so, and in a few moments returned, though without the bracelet.

"Adele," said he to his wife, "it is very strange, but not seeing the officer who took your bracelet, I asked one of the others, who has been in the royal box the whole evening, and he says your bracelet was neither sent for nor fetched."

The baronne looked aghast. "François," she said, "that man must have been an impostor. He was no officer, but an affreux thief."

The baron smiled as his little wife jumped so speedily at such a conclusion, and persisted that the bracelet was safe.

and had really been sent for by the queen, and that the officer whom he had consulted was misinformed.

But woman's penetration had guessed rightly, as the morning proved.

As the bracelet was not forthcoming the next morning, M. de V—spoke to the Chief Inspector of the police on the subject, who quite coincided with madame's opinion as to the valuable ornament having been artfully stolen. The baron was greatly annoyed, and ordered the inspector to advertise for it in every direction, offering a reward of 3,000 francs to the person who should restore it. The Inspector promised to do all in his power toward the recovery of the bracelet, as well for the sake of society at large as the satisfaction of his employers.

But three months passed away—350 francs had been spent in advertising—and still the missing bracelet was not found.

It was growing dusk one evening in May, when a servant informed Madame de V—that monsieur the Inspector wished to speak to her or monsieur the Baron. As the latter was out, Madame de V—went down stairs to speak to the inspector, with whom she had had many previous interviews on the subject of the diamond bracelet. As she entered the room he bowed in the respectful manner peculiar to him. "I believe I have some good news for madame this evening," he said. His voice was rather singular, somewhat resembling a boy's when changing. Madame de V—had often remarked this peculiarity before, so it did not strike her that evening. "The detectives," he continued "engaged in the business have met with a bracelet in a Jew's second-hand shop at Lyons so exactly the same as madame's, that it only remains for it to be identified before we can claim it as madame's property. My object in coming this evening is to ask madame to allow me to look at the other, that I may be able to swear to the one at Lyons being its fellow."

The baronne, overjoyed at the idea of recovering her lost property, tripped out of the room, and soon returned with the remaining bracelet. The Inspector took it carefully in his hand and proceeded to examine it minutely. "The bracelets are exactly alike?" he inquired of Madame de V—.

"Exactly," repeated the baronne.

"I believe I have learned the pattern thoroughly," said the inspector, musingly; "yet there may be some difficulty in not having both bracelets together to compare them one with another."

"Why not take this to Lyons, then?" suggested the baronne.

"Ah, Madame, it would scarcely do to trust even a police inspector after having been deceived by an officer in disguise."

"Oh!" laughed Mme. de V—; "do you not think I would trust you, Monsieur Inspector, after all the interest and trouble you have taken in the matter? Take the bracelet, and I hope you will bring me both back ere many days have passed."

The Inspector still hesitated, but at length consented to do as the baronne wished him, and went away, bearing the sparkling ornament with him. On her husband's return the baronne, of course, told him of the joyful discovery.

A week, however, passed away without the Inspector's arriving with the stolen property. One morning, therefore, the baron called on the Inspector to make inquiries respecting it. The latter seemed very much surprised on being asked if the bracelet had been brought from Lyons. "What does Monsieur mean? I never heard anything about the bracelet having been found at Lyons; it is surely a mistake. Monsieur has misunderstood Madame la Baronne."

"You had better come yourself and have this strange mystery cleared up, M. Inspector," answered the baron, sternly. "Madame is at home, and will be happy to assure you herself that it is no mistake—that you called and informed her of the diamonds having been traced to Lyons."

The Baron and the Inspector repaired to the Rue des Champs Elysées, where they found Madame de V—at home, as her husband had said. She confirmed what he had already said about the Inspector having called one night at dusk, and having informed her that the bracelet was supposed to be at a Jew's second-hand shop at Lyons.

The Inspector smiled incredulously as he said: "Does Madame really think that I called at dusk, after business hours, when all the world is out, or enjoying itself with company at home? Bah! I do my business in business hours. The disguised officer most probably thought he could do another little stroke of business in an official uniform of another cut—the villain! Mais—I am afraid Madame will never see either of her bracelets again after this."

The Inspector's words came but too true. From that day to this Madame la Baronne de V—'s diamond bracelets have never been heard of.

THE MANNERS of a gentleman are one thing and those of a dancing-master are another. We have a striking illustration of this in an anecdote which is published among other reminiscences of Lord Stair. Louis XIV., being told that Lord Stair was one of the best-bred men in Europe, replied that he would shortly put him to the test. Asking Lord Stair to take an airing with him, as soon as the door of the coach was opened he bade him pass and go in. Lord Stair bowed and obeyed. The King remarked, "The world is right in the character it gives. Another person would have troubled me with ceremony." Now, according to the vulgar idea of "politeness," Lord Stair was wrong; he should have bowed and scraped, and said, "After you, Sir." To our thinking, this matter of manners, is strangely misunderstood at the present day. You will every day see people who are constantly prating of manners, saying and doing the rudest things with a coolness which very nearly approaches to unconsciousness, seeming to think that their whole duty is done if they bow and smile properly. True politeness consists in a regard for the feelings of others, and no one can claim to be a lady or gentleman who disregards this simple rule. The mechanical movements and studied politeness of a dancing-master may be acquired, but that gentleness of feeling which underlies true politeness is the gift of nature alone.

AN AWFUL OPERATION.

BEING AN ACCOUNT OF A WONDERFUL CROP.

EVEN in these days of Sensation I was not prepared for the horrible tortures practised by—shall I say men? Yes, by men upon their fellow-men in the cause of civilization, in the obtrusive advancement of science, and under the pretence of conferring benefits—ineestimable benefits—on mankind. "Oh, Thingummy" (I forget the letter of the quotation, but the spirit is the point),

"What crimes do they not commit in thy name!"

Notes of admiration are wanting to me; all the available ones, of the only size really adapted to my meaning, are used on the largest Posters about Town. Those of a lesser note fail me. But I will multiply them—I will raise them to the nth!

Sir, I have undergone an Awful Operation!! I tremble while thinking of the past!!! Have I been racked? Worse than that!!! Drawn? Worse than that; aye, worse than if I had been caricatured by photography into the bargain. Quartered? Worse—a deal worse!!!! Tight boots? No. Thumbscrew? No! You will never guess. Oh, Mr. Punch, tell it not in Gath, if you ever go there, but I, your beautiful, your own, your own correspondent, have had my hair cut!!!! Cut by—I am not going to use strong language—but am going to say, cut by Machinery!!! Never, never, again, Mr. P., not even if my locks grow long, matted and ragged, as did those of Peter the Wild Boy, or Peter the Hermit, or some Peter or other. However, I'll no more be a repeater of this name, but come to the point at once. Point! that word recalls the scene from first to last. "Did I want the points"

—he, the hair-dresser, called them pints—"off? or would I 'ave a deal off?" I chose the latter. No sooner was I vested in a garment—something between a gentleman's summer dressing-gown and a lady's bathing-dress—of that grotesque pattern with which, of late, the pictures of a facetious singer styling himself "The Cure" have made us sufficiently acquainted—no sooner, I say, was I bound in this extraordinary wrapper—like a volume of Strype—and had taken my seat in front of a large looking-glass, than the operator began arranging certain apparatus that filled me with apprehension, and made my hair stand right up on end, all ready for cutting, like quills upon the fretful what-you-may-call-him. He first pulled ropes from the ceilings after the manner of one about to imitate M. Leotard on the trapeze. These ropes were fitted with a peculiar pair of scissors, made, as I take it, on the model of those used in the opening of a Pantomime, when his Majesty King Hungulin sends for the Court Barber to trim him; on which occasion the usual result is that the Court Barber is trimmed by his Gracious Majesty. I assure you that to have seen my hair-dresser's talented assistants dance into the room, footing it to some lively measure, with huge cans labelled "Hot Water," "Soap," "Bar's Grease," would not have been to me a matter for much surprise. However, they didn't. Such a proceeding would have savored of a joke; and this, my friend, was no joke, I do most solemnly declare! Two more ropes held a circular comb; a young man took his place behind my chair; then there were, to use another stage phrase, "wheels heard without," and, with a whirr-whirr-whirr, like the deafening sound in a small manufactory, or in the Polytechnic during the hours of exhibition, the ropes began to move rapidly up, up, up, down, down, backwards and forwards, and round and round, the scissors commenced snipping the air, and the comb, as it appeared to me, began circling round my head, like the fearful stuffed nondescript bird at Astley's, which is worked by a string over the prostrate body of the agonized dummy "Mazepa." Suddenly the young man controlled the gambols of these wild creatures, and disdained that, tearing through it like buffaloes through a prairie, and seizing upon my scalp with the ferocity of a Red Indian warrior.

"Here! Hi! Take 'em off!" I cried.

"You find 'em a little 'ard at first, sir?" inquired the young man blandly.

"Hard! I should rather say I——" whirr, whirr, whirr—off again. "Hold! Stop!"

The young man takes this opportunity to explain:

"You see, sir, our proprietor only patented 'em last week, and we ain't got quite the way of working 'em; it's a little awkward like at first."

Awkward! Ha! ha! Good, that. My hair was lying about the floor in little twisted knots: what remained on my head resembled—hang me, if I know what it resembled, except the tufts on Mr. Pecksniff's head, or the comic wigs in which the Brothers WEBB appeared as the Twin Dromios. And oh! my poor skin!

"Should he take hany more off?" inquired the young man—the youngest man, I subsequently found, who had not long been out of his apprenticeship.

"Trim it evenly," said I; "and, for Heaven's sake, in the old-fashioned way."

He smiled.

"I should prefer doin' of it in that way myself, sir," he whispered in my ear, "but Master says we must use this 'ere apparatus, so as in this slack time of year we may get our 'ands in for the Seasoning."

This comes of stopping in Town unfashionably! Oh, cursed fate, that didn't give me to the moor!

"There," said I, "just brush it smooth, and have done."

"'Ave it washed, sir? Gents mostly 'as it washed."

"Yes, by all means."

"I and will you 'ave some Medicated Balsamic Regenerator, or our Emollient Capellarian?"

"Some of the Capellarian," I answered, in the off-hand manner of one accustomed to the regular use of that expensive pomade.

It is always as well to give your hairdresser this idea, or, if you show the least indecision or ignorance on this subject, he will be down upon you, all in the way of business, with tender inquiries as to whether "you wouldn't like a bottle of the Balsam?" or, more persuasively, as if it cost nothing, "Shall I horder you a pot of the Capellarian?" If you show any signs of weakness or wavering, he will put it in a more forcible manner—"You should 'ave a bottle of our Tittivator," or, decisively, "You'll take a bottle of The Regenerator, then, with you, sir, to-day," and this, mind you, settles the question. If you don't buy his master's wares, on which the young man doubtless gets a per-centage, and justly too, you cannot but feel that you have fallen in the opinion of the hair-dresser; not that this is of importance when you are once out of his hands, but while in the power of a man who holds the scissors over you, it is politic to make him think as much of you as possible. Boldly, therefore, profess a thorough knowledge of all the unguents in the shop. "The Medicated Balsam is your constant companion: without the Tittivator," say you, "no person's toilette-table can be complete. The Capellarian is the delight of your mornings—the Medicated Balsam the solace of your declining day."

Now for the wash. The ceiling opens above my head; a pipe appears; a brazen tube like the neck of a watering-pot pointing downwards, taking my hair for the flower-bed. I am about to ask "what this is," when—ssssh—squish—down it comes and I am deluged with the fragrant Capellarian. This is not so bad. Before I can recover my breath, whirr, whirr, whirr go the wheels again, and two fierce iron or brazen arms appear from somewhere, armed with the stiffest of rough towels. I try to avoid the blow from the one on my right, and am caught with wonderful precision on my left ear by the other. Both arms begin to pummel me; whirr, whirr, go the wheels; everything seems in motion, the looking-glass, I fancy, dances, the eries of other struggling victims rise from various corners of the room, the little comb laughed to see such sport, the brush runs away with the scissors, the young men execute a war-dance—whizz, whizz, whizz—I don't know whether I stand on my head or my heels, until I find myself in the front shop before the counter, paying money to a cheerful-looking lady in black.

Lovers of sensation should be made acquainted with this fact, viz., that, for all the above mentioned excitement, performed exactly as described, you are only charged One Shilling; ay—and, what is more, in that small sum is also included Shaving by Machinery, if you feel inclined to stop for it. I didn't; and, therefore, am still able to sign myself

FAITHFUL TO COPY.—Another eccentric creature died this week who may be instanced as an example of the stupidity attained by some clerks in the government offices. This man was eccentric from the absolutely unintelligent way he would copy anything regularly set before him. Reason seemed actually to have abdicated her throne in his mind. A memorable example of his dulness was often told on him. In 1842 an extensive conflagration spread ruin in the town where he was employed and it occurred just on the eve of the meeting of the General Council. There was such confusion and distress in the town that the Prefect determined to postpone the meeting of the General Council for a fortnight. He drew this rough draught of a notice to the members of the General Council: "Sir—The confusion and distress of—are so great I have thought proper to adjourn the meeting of the General Council until the 15th instant." As the poor creature who just died wrote a beautiful hand he was selected to copy this notice. Some wag knowing his stupidity took advantage of his momentary absence from his desk to substitute this rough draught: "Sir—The confusion and distress of—are so great in consequence of the recent conflagration I have thought proper to adjourn the eclipse of the sun until the 15th instant." He copied this note thirty-six times, placed it in a huge envelope and sealed it with the official seal. You may imagine the uglier.—Paris Correspondence.

REGISTER YOUR MONEY LETTERS.—By new regulations of the Post Office Department no record by post-bills is now required to be made by Postmasters, except of unpaid or registered letters; therefore there is no way of tracing missing ones in other cases as formerly. The fee for registry is twenty cents, for which a receipt is returned by the Postmaster to the sender from the party receiving the money.—Sac. Union.

WRECKS.

I WALKED one day alone upon the shore,
Watching the pale clouds in the sultry sky,
And out at sea the ships which drifted by,
Hearing, as in a dream, the waves' dull roar.

The slanting sun shone white along the sand,
Strewn with green sea-weed and with crimson shells
Out of the ocean's dim, mysterious cells,
Jewelling all the broad skirts of the land.

The salt sea-breeze blew inland toward the west;
The sea-gulls darted past me in their flight;
The blue waves flashed with phosphorescent light,
Heaving and swaying in their wild unrest.

Landward they rolled to smite the gray old rocks,
The bald old rocks, which stood with shoulders bare,
All scarred and seamed, under the sun's broad glare,
And feet immersed, waiting the wild waves' shocks.

Along the shore were skeletons of wrecks,
Fair ships that once had sailed the purple seas,
Laden with spices and with fragrant teas;
And smiling passengers had paced their decks.

I looked across the seething harbor bar,
And heard, in fancy, women weep and wail,
I saw sad faces that with fright were pale,
And straggling forms which clung to mast and spar.

"Alas!" I thought, "poor souls, with land so near,
After long days upon the pathless deep,
At last beneath the ocean waves to sleep,
Away from home and those whom they hold dear."

I walked the city's crowded streets once more,
And past me rolled the tide of human-kind,
And there I saw sad wrecks which called to mind
My lonely wanderings by the wild sea-shore.

How fair they seemed when sailing forth from land;
What precious freight in golden hopes they bore;
What fond eyes watched them from the fading shore;
The wind which filled their sails how soft and bland!

But soon the storm loomed black within the sky,
And mast and rudder, spar and shrouding sail
Were torn and shattered in the furious gale;
And thus upon Life's sea they pass us by!

CHAPTER I.

THE MASTER.

ENSIGN HARCOURT LOWTHER, of her Majesty's 51st Light Infantry, sat staring out into his garden at Port Arthur, watching a couple of convict gardeners—who were going about their work with a monotonous and exasperating deliberation of movement—and lamenting the evil fortune that had stationed him in his present quarters. He had a great many troubles, this elegant young ensign, who was for the time being destined to bloom unseen, and waste the graces that ought to have adorned Belgravia, upon the desert air of the Tasmanian peninsula. He had, as he himself elegantly expressed it, no end of troubles. First and foremost, his cigar would not draw; and as it was the last of a case of choice cabanas, the calamity was not a small one. Secondly, there had been a drought in fair Van Diemen's land for the last month or so. The verdure was growing brown and leathery; the feathery masses of the tall fern shrivelled at the edges like scorched paper; the stiff foliage of the cedars seemed to rattle as it shook in the dry, dust-laden wind, and the thermometer stood at a hundred and ten in the shade: true, it might drop forty degrees or so at any moment, with the uprising of a moist breeze from the sea, but, pending the arrival of that auspicious moment, Mr. Lowther was in a very bad temper. What had he done that he should be stationed in a convict settlement, with no chance of any gain or glory as compensation for his trials; with no one to speak to except a prosy old police magistrate or a puritanical chaplain; with nothing better to look at than the eternal blue of the ocean, or a whaling vessel anchored in the bay; with nothing to listen to except the clanking of hammers and banging of timber and jingling of iron in the busy dock-yard; with no better enjoyment to hope for than a couple of days' quail-shooting or kangaroo-hunting in the interior?

"If I'd been Desperate Bill the Burglar, or Slippery Stevie the Smasher, I couldn't be much worse off," he muttered, as he gave up the unmanageable cigar, and went across the room to a table, upon which there were some tobacco jars and meerschaum pipes. "Now then, Tredethlyn, are those boots ready?"

This question was addressed to an invisible some one, whose low whistling of a jovial Irish air was audible from the adjoining room.

"Yes, captain," answered a cheery voice—the whistler had broken off in the middle of the "wild sweet briary fence that around the flowers of Erin dwells"—"Yes, captain, quite ready."

"That's another aggravation," exclaimed Mr. Lowther, "the fellow will call me captain, as if it wasn't an underhand way of reminding me that for a poor devil like me there's no chance of promotion."

"But you see you are captain here, Mr. Lowther," said the whistler, emerging from the adjoining chamber with a pair of newly blacked Wellingtons in his hand; "you're captain, major, colonel, general, and field-marshal, all in one, here, with seventy men under your control, and any amount of convicts to look after."

"If there's one thing in the world that's more execrating than another, it's that fellow's cheerfulness," cried Mr. Lowther. "I can fancy the feelings of an elegant young French marquis of the vieille roche, a scion of the Mortemars or Birons, buried alive in an underground cell in the Bastille, with a lively commiseration for his companion—a cheerful bourgeois, who pretended to make light of his situation, and eat his mouldy bread with a relish. Now then, Tredethlyn, where are the boot-hooks? That fellow always forgets something."

"That fellow," otherwise Francis Tredethlyn, was a tall, stalwart private soldier, of some seven-and-twenty years of age, who had been honored by an appointment to the post of valet and butler to Ensign Harcourt Lowther.

If the stalwart soldier had not been blest with one of those imperturbable Mark Tapley-like tempers, which resemble the patent elliptic springs of a crack coachbuilder's carriage, and can convey the traveller unjolted and uninjured over the roughest roads in the journey of life, he might have found his position as valet, majordomo, and occasional confidant to Harcourt Lowther, far from the pleasantest berth to be had in this great tempest-tossed vessel which we call the world. But Francis Tredethlyn's serenity of disposition was proof against the most wearisome burden a man is ever called upon to bear, the companionship of a discontented fellow-creature, and all the variable moods, from a feverish cynical kind of gaiety to a dreary and ill-tempered gravity, which were engendered out of that perpetual discontent.

But Frank Tredethlyn bore it all cheerfully; with a manly, open-hearted cheerfulness that had no taint of sycophancy. If the young ensign wanted to talk to him, well and good; he was ready and willing to talk about anything or everything; but he had his own sentiments upon most subjects, which sentiments were of a very fast color, and did not take any reflected hue from Mr. Lowther's aristocratic opinions.

It is not to be supposed that Francis Tredethlyn, private soldier and valet, had any claims to intellectual equality with his master. The private wrote a fair commercial hand, very bold, and big, and resolute-looking; could read aloud without stumbling ignominiously over the big words; could cast up accounts; and, looking back at the history of the universal past, saw glimmering faintly over a sea of darkness and oblivion such beacon lights as a Norman invasion; a solemn meeting on the flat turf of Runnymede; a Reformation, with a good deal of martyr-burning and head-chopping attendant thereupon; a fiery hook-nosed Dutch liberator, a Jacobite rebellion, and a Reform Bill. Beyond these limits the attainments of Mr. Tredethlyn did not extend; and the ensign, when grumbling at the general discomfort of his life, was apt to say that it was a hard thing to be flung for companionship on a fellow who was nothing but a boor and a clod.

Mr. Lowther treated his valet very much as a spoiled child treats her doll; sometimes it pleased him to be monotonously cordial and familiar with his attendant, while at another time he held Francis aloof by a haughty reserve of manner, beyond which barrier the other made no effort to penetrate.

"The fellow does possess that merit," Harcourt Lowther said sometimes, "he knows how to keep his place."

The fact of the matter is, that the valet was infinitely less dependent upon his master's companionship than his master upon him. There were a hundred ways in which Francis Tredethlyn could amuse himself; and there was not a clod in the sky, a wave of the sea, a leaf in the garden, out of which he could not take some scrap of pleasure, and which had not a deeper and truer meaning for him than for the idle young officer who lay yawning upon his narrow couch with his feet in the air, and with nothing better to do than to admire the cut of his boots, obtained on credit from a confiding West-end tradesman. Francis had that wide sympathy with his fellow-creatures which is a special attribute of some men, and he was on the friendliest possible terms with the two convicts, both of whom had achieved some renown as the most incorrigible and execrable specimens of the criminal class. Every dog in the little settlement fawned upon Frank Tredethlyn, and ran to rub his head against his knees, and slaver his hand with its flapping tongue. He had made a kennel for two or three of these canine acquaintances in a shady corner of the big garden, much to the disgust and annoyance of the ensign, who only cared for such dogs as are calculated to assist the sports of their lord and master. Stag-hounds and beagles, foxhounds and barriers, setters, pointers, and retrievers, clever ratting Scotch terriers, well-bred and savage bulls, even little short-eared toy terriers, or fawn-colored and black-muzzled pugs were all very well placed in the scheme of creation; but Mr. Lowther could find no explanation for the existence of those mongrel creatures who seem to have nothing to do in the world but to attach themselves with slavish devotion to some brutal master, or to lie in the most disreputable courts and alleys of a city in hot weather and catch flies.

But somehow or other Francis Tredethlyn seemed generally to do pretty much as he liked, in spite of military despotism and Mr. Harcourt Lowther. The dogs were unmolested in their shady corner; and the ensign was so good as to say that a little aviary of wicker-work and wire, which Tredethlyn constructed in his leisure hours and duly filled with tiny feathered inhabitants, that kept up a faint twittering in the sunshine, was an improvement to the cottage. Francis was very handy, and could do wonders with a hammer and a handful of tin tacks; and was, indeed, altogether a great acquisition to his master, as Mr. Corbett, the police magistrate, sometimes remarked to Harcourt Lowther.

"Yes," Harcourt answered, indifferently, "the fellow is a cut above most of his class. He is a Cornishman, it seems, and the son of a small farmer in that land of Tre, Pol, and Pen; and he tells me that he has an old miser uncle who is supposed to be preternaturally rich. Egad! I wish I had such an uncle! All my uncles are misers, for the matter of that; but then, unluckily, the poor devils are misers because they're preternaturally poor."

Mr. Lowther stood before the little looking-glass, in the sunny window, admiring himself, while Francis Tredethlyn helped him on with his coat. He was going to dine with Mr.

Corbett, the magistrate, and to spend the evening in the society of Miss Corbett, who had come out to the colony with the idea that general officers and wealthy judges would be waiting on the shore ready to conduct her straight from the place of debarkation to the hymeneal altar, and had been a little soured by the disenchantment which had too surely followed her arrival. She was a glistening damsel of thirty-five, very tall and square, and of a prevailing drab color, and she played tremendous variations of shrill Scottish melodies on a piano which had been warranted to preserve its purity of tone in any climate, but upon which the nearest thing to an harmonious octave was a wild stretch of thirteen notes. Mr. Lowther must have been very low in the world when he had nothing better to do than to sit by Miss Corbett's piano while she banged and rattled at the numerous disguises under which "Kinloch of Kinloch" appeared in a fantasia of twelve pages, now prancing jauntily in triplets, now rushing up and down the piano in chromatic scales, now scampering wildly in double arpeggios, now banging himself out of all knowledge in common chords, or wailing dismally in a hideous minor. Fate had done its worst for Ensign Lowther when he had no better amusement than to lounge by the side of that ill-used old instrument, staring reflectively at the thin places on the top of Miss Corbett's drab-colored head.

Harcourt Lowther stood before the glass admiring his handsome face, while his valet brushed the collar of his coat. Well, he had a right to admire himself! If Providence had treated him badly, capricious Mother Nature, who, like any other frivolous-minded parent, elects her prime favorites without rhyme or reason, had been very bountiful to him in the matter of an aquiline nose, a finely-modelled mouth and chin, and deep, womanish blue eyes, with a shimmer of gold on their lashes. No one could deny Mr. Lowther's claim to be considered a remarkably handsome man, an elegant young man, a very agreeable and accomplished gentleman: the world, of course, had nothing to do with that rougher edge of the ensign's character which he turned to his valet, Francis Tredethlyn, in his cottage at Port Arthur.

He went out, presently, swinging his thin cane, and whistling all the triplets and cadences of an elaborate scena; he was an amateur musician and an amateur artist, playing more or less upon two or three different instruments, and painting more or less in half a dozen different styles. He could ride across country to the astonishment of burly Leicestershire squires, who were inclined to think contemptuously of his small waist and pretty blue eyes, his amber-tinted, jockey-club-perfumed whiskers, trim tops and unstained "pink." He was a good shot, and long at Harrow had been renowned as a cricketer. He spoke three or four modern languages, and had that dim recollection of his classic studies which is sufficient for a man of the world who knows how to make much out of little. He was altogether a very accomplished gentleman; but with him intellectual pursuits were a means rather than an end, and he took very little pleasure in the society of books or bookmen. He wanted to be in the world, foremost in the perpetual strife, amid the crash of drums and trumpets, the roaring of cannon, and glitter of emblazoned standards, flaunting gallantly in the wind. He wanted to be one of the conquerors in the universal tournament, and to ride up to the Queen of Beauty flushed and triumphant after the strife, to be admired and caressed. This is why the inaction of his present existence was so utterly intolerable to him. He had a supreme belief in himself, and in the indisputable nature of his right to the best and brightest amongst earth's prizes. The time must be, indeed, out of joint in which there was nothing better for such as he than a dreary convict settlement in the Tasmanian peninsula.

Unluckily, the time was out of joint. Robert Lowther, of Lowther Hall, Hampshire, had given his younger son an aristocratic name and a gentlemanly education, and then, having nothing more to bestow upon him, had been forced to leave the lad to fish for himself in the troubled waters of life. Under these circumstances the young man had elected to become a barrister; but after a three years' course of reading, in which the cultivation of light literature and modern languages was diversified by a slight sprinkling of legal study, he had grown heartily sick of his comfortably furnished third floor in Hare Court, Temple, and had gladly accepted the price of a commission in one of her Majesty's light infantry regiments from an affectionate maiden aunt, believing that the regiment would be speedily under orders for India, where glory and loot no doubt awaited a dashing young soldier with a very high opinion of his own merits.

Unhappily for Mr. Lowther, the regiment did not go to India; but he and his captain, with a detachment of seventy rank and file, embarked at Deptford, on a misty morning in October, in charge of 450 convicts bound for Hobart-town. At the time of which I write the ensign had been nearly a twelvemonth in Van Diemen's Land, and before him lay the prospect of another dreary year which must elapse before there was much chance of his seeing a change of quarters. There are some people who take their troubles with a cheerful countenance, and make the best of a bad bargain; but Mr. Lowther was not one of them. He had begun to grumble before the convict ship left Deptford, and he had gone on complaining, with very little intermission, until to-day, and was likely so to continue until the end of the chapter. Napoleon at St. Helena could scarcely have felt his exile more keenly; nor could that fallen hero have more bitterly resented the injustice of his fate than Harcourt Osborne Lowther, who believed that there must be something radically wrong in a universe in which there was no provision of £40,000 or so a year for an elegant young man, with a perfect aquiline nose, a clear ringing touch upon the piano, a trumpet tone on the flute, a talent for taking pen-and-ink portraits that were equal to anything of Count D'Orsay's, and an irreproachable taste in waistcoats.

He went out now in very tolerable spirits, first, because he had worked himself into a good temper by grumbling to himself and Tredethlyn all day; secondly, because he was going to have a good dinner and some rare old tawny port, which was the boast of Mr. Corbett, the magistrate; and thirdly, because he was going to be admired—and in a Tasmanian settlement even the worship of a young lady with bony fingers and drab-colored eyes and hair is not altogether a despicable tribute.

"When I hear 'Kinloch of Kinloch' tortured out of all semblance of himself upon that wretched piano, I let myself go somehow or other," thought the ensign, "and I fancy myself standing behind Maude Hillary's Broadwood in the long drawing-room at Twickenham. Twickenham! Shall I ever see Twickenham again, and Maude Hillary, and the twinkling light upon the river, and the low branches of the chestnuts, the sedge banks, the lazy boats, the lights up at the 'Star and Garter' glimmering across the dusky valley? Shall I ever see that fair civilized land again, or shall I die in this condemned and accursed hole? die, forgotten and unlamented before I have made any mark in the world!"

CHAPTER II.

THE MAN.

WHILE Mr. Lowther went to eat his dinner with the hospitable magistrate, Francis Tredethlyn did his work briskly; folding his master's coats and waistcoats, brushing boots, clearing away little heaps of cigar ash, and picking up torn scraps of paper and open books cast recklessly upon the floor by a reader who was too badly disposed towards a world that had ill-treated him to find the opinions of any author entirely to his taste.

The soldier whistled that lively melody in praise of Erin's daughters all the time, and achieved his task with the rapid neatness of a male Cinderella specially endowed by some fairy godmother; and when Mr. Lowther's humble sitting-room and bedroom were restored to perfect order, his valet retired to his own little apartment, which was a shed-like chamber at the back of the cottage, and a kind of a compromise between a dressing-room and a wash-house. Here Mr. Tredethlyn made his toilet, which consisted of a rapid plunge of his head and throat into a tub of cold water, some brisk operations with a cake of yellow soap, accompanied by sputtering and whizzing noises of an alarming character, a little fierce rubbing down with a coarse towel, and the smart application of a stiff and implacable-looking hair-brush. When this was done Francis Tredethlyn put on his jacket, and went out into the garden to smoke his pipe and converse with the convicts.

Now that the gifts of nature had been enhanced by the adornments of art, the ensign's valet was by no means a bad-looking fellow. He was tall, broad-shouldered and muscular in build as a modern Hercules. His closely cut black hair revealed the outline of a well-shaped head well placed upon his shoulders. Under his dark, almost gipsy-brown skin, was a rich crimson glow, which deepened or faded under the influence of any powerful emotion. His nose was straight, but rather short, and of no particular type; but a sculptor would have told you there was a special beauty about the curve of his full open nostrils, and Honore de Balzac would have informed you that a man with that kind of nostril is generally good for something in this world. His forehead was low, stronger in the perceptive than in the reflective organs; his eyes were of a clear gray, darkened by the shadow of thick black lashes. He was a handsome soldier; he would have made a handsome gladiator in the old Roman days; a noble-looking brigand in the days when brigands were chivalrous; a dashing highwayman, in the age when Claude Duval rode gaily to his death on Tyburn tree; a glorious sporting farmer down in Leicestershire to-day; but no power upon this earth could have transformed him into an elegant West-end loungeur, an accomplished dawdler in fashionable drawing-rooms, or a "gentleman" in the modern acceptance of the word.

He went out into the garden now, to smoke his pipe of bird's-eye and talk to the convict gardeners, who brightened at his approach, and deliberately planted themselves in a convenient position upon their spades, in order to converse with him. I am sorry to say that he was as much at home in their society as if they had been the most estimable of mankind, and that he encouraged them to talk freely of their burglarious experiences in the old world. Was there not a smack of brigandage and adventure in those experiences, and even a dash of chivalry, according to the two men's own showing? for they told stories of encounters in which they shone out quite with heroic lustre from their rooted objection to cut an elderly lady's throat, and their gallant bearing towards a high-minded young damsel who had led them from room to room in her father's mansion, and had pointed with her own fair hands to the whereabouts of the family valuables. Francis Tredethlyn sat upon the trunk of a fallen acacia, watching the lazy clouds in the still evening sky, and smoking his pipe, long after the two convicts had struck work and retired to their own quarters. He sat smoking and musing; thinking, as I suppose a man so banished must think, of that other far-away world which he had left behind him, and which it seemed to him sometimes, in such still moments as these, that he should never see again.

"So far away, so very far away!" he mused. "I wonder how the little village street upon the hill is looking now? It's winter-time now there, or getting toward's winter-time, anyhow. I can fancy it of an evening, with the lights twinkling in the low shop-windows, the big castle gate frowning down upon the poor little street; the churchyard, where Susy and I have played, all dark and lonesome in the winter night; and Susy herself—pretty little dark-eyed Susy—sitting by the hearth in the big kitchen at Tredethlyn, stitch, stitch, stitch, while the old man nods and snores over his newspaper. Poor little Susy! is she fond of me, I wonder! and will she be pleased to marry me, if ever I am able to go back, and say, 'Susy, the best I could do, after running away and leaving, was to save up money and buy my discharge, so that I might come home again to claim the old promise—for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer? We couldn't well be poorer than we should be just at first; for, of course, the old chap would turn rusty, and cut Susy off with a shilling; but who cares for that?' thought Francis Tredethlyn, snapping his fingers in the independence of his spirit. "If Susy loves me, and I love Susy, and we're both young, and strong, and industrious, what's to prevent us getting on in the world without anybody's money to help us?"

The soldier smoked another pipe in a dreamy reverie, in which his thoughts still hovered about one familiar spot in his native country—a long, low, stone-built farm-house, standing alone upon a broad plateau of bare moorland, very dreary of aspect in winter—a dismal, ghastly-looking homestead, in which the ornamental had been sacrificed for the useful—a gaunt, naked-looking dwelling-place, upon whose decoration or improvement a ten-pound note had not been expended within the memory of man—a house which had gone down through three generations of close-fisted, close-grained owners, and which had grown uglier and drearier under the rule of every generation.

This was the habitation which stood as clearly out against the vague background of Francis Tredethlyn's dreams as if it had been palpably present upon the rising ground on the other side of the bay. This was the house, and in the low narrow doorway, fronting the desolate expanse of stunted brown grass, the soldier saw the slender figure of a girl—a girl with dark, gentle eyes, and a Quaker-like dress of coarse brown stuff—a girl who stood with her hand shading her eyes, looking at the distant figure of an old man plodding homeward in the winter twilight. He had so often seen her thus that it was only natural the picture of her should present itself to his mind to-night as his thoughts wandered homeward. He was so far away from this girl and the familiar place in which he had so often walked by her side. He thought of her almost as the dead may think of the living—if they do think of us.

"Poor little Susy! I wonder if she loved me—whether she loves me still? I wasn't like some of your lovers—I wasn't one of your desperate fellows. I had no hot fits, or cold fits, or jealous fits, or such like, and there are some folks that might say I was never in love at all. But I was very fond of Susy—poor little tender-hearted Susy! I used to think of her, somehow, as if she had been my little sister. I think of her like that now."

CHAPTER III.

TIDINGS OF HOME.

It was late when Mr. Lowther came home from his friend the magistrate's. The faint flush that lighted up his face, and the unwonted lustre of his eyes, bore testimony to the merits of Mr. Corbett's tawny port. All Sandemann's choicest vintages would not have tempted Harcourt Lowther to sit listening to a prosy old magistrate's civil service experiences, in Europe; but on this side of the world a bottle of good wine and a tolerably civilized companion were not entirely to be despised. The ensign was in a very good temper when he came into the little parlor, where a swinging lamp burned brightly, and where a tobacco-jar, a meerschaum, a case bottle of Schiedam, a tumbler and a jug of water, were set upon the table ready for the master of the domain. Mr. Lowther was in excellent temper, and inclined to be especially civil to his valet.

"No Schiedam to-night, Tredethlyn," he said, throwing himself into the wicker easy chair, and stretching his feet upon a smaller chair that stood opposite to him: "I've had a little too much of that old fellow's port. Devilish good stuff it is, too, if it hadn't a tendency to spoil a man's complexion, and concentrate itself in his nose. I'll take a pipe, though. Just give me a light, will you, Tredethlyn?"

He sat in a lazy attitude, with his head thrown back against the rail of the chair, and daintily arranged the stray shreds of tobacco in the bowl of his pipe with the delicate tip of his little finger; while the private lighted a long strip of folded paper and handed it to his master.

"Oh, by-the-bye," muttered Mr. Lowther, speaking with his teeth shut upon the amber mouthpiece of his pipe, "I've got some news for you, Tredethlyn. Just put your hand in my coat pocket, and take out the paper you'll find there. Goodness knows what it means—a legacy of fifty pounds or so, I suppose. Anyhow, you're a lucky devil. I should be glad enough to get even such a windfall as that; but I never hear of anything to my advantage."

Francis Tredethlyn had taken the paper from his master's pocket by this time; it was an old copy of the Times, and he presented it to the ensign, but the other pushed it away impatiently.

"I don't want it," he said; "I think I read every line of it while old Corbett was snoring after dinner. Look at the third advertisement in the second column of the supplement."

The soldier did as he was directed, and read the advertisement aloud very slowly, and in a tone of unmitigated wonder.

"Francis Tredethlyn, nephew of the late Oliver Tredethlyn, of Tredethlyn Grange, near Landresdale, Cornwall. If the above-mentioned will apply to Messrs. Krusdale and Scardon, solicitors, 29 Verulam Buildings, Gray's Inn, he will hear of something to his advantage."

"The late Oliver Tredethlyn!" cried Francis, staring blankly at the paper; my uncle's dead then!"

"Was he alive when you left England?" asked the ensign.

"He was alive when I left Cornwall. Dead! my uncle Oliver!" the young man said, in a dreamy voice; "and I pictured him to-night in my fancy, plodding home from the outlying lands, as hale, and stern and sturdy as ever. Dead! and he may have been dead ever so long, for all this tells me," added Francis Tredethlyn, pointing to the advertisement.

"You were uncommonly fond of your uncle, I suppose, from the way you talk of him," Mr. Lowther remarked, carelessly. He was in a good humor to-night, and ready to talk about anything—inclined to take almost an interest in the affairs of another man, and that other man his valet!

"Fond of him!" exclaimed Francis Tredethlyn; "fond of my uncle Oliver! I don't think the creature ever lived that was fond of him, or whose love he'd have cared to have. He liked folks to obey him, and cut things as close as he wanted 'em cut, but beyond that he didn't care what they thought or what they did. I suppose he did love his daughter, though, after a fashion, but it was a very hard fashion. No, sir, I wasn't particularly fond of my uncle, Oliver Tredethlyn, but I'm struck all of a heap, by the news of his death coming upon me so sudden; and I'm thinking of the effect that it will have on my cousin Susy—she's all alone in the world, now—poor little Susy!"

The ensign looked up quickly. "Susy," he said, "who the deuce is your cousin Susy?"

"She's my uncle Oliver's only daughter, sir; his only child, too, for the matter of that. We were engaged to be married, sir, but things went wrong with me at home, and I ran away and enlisted."

"Ah! How long ago did all that happen?"

"Nearly five years, sir."

"And you've kept up some sort of a correspondence with your cousin since then, I suppose?"

"Not I, sir; her father wasn't the man to let her write a letter that would cost a lump of money for postage, or to write any letter to such a scamp as me, either; and poor Susy was too close watched and too obedient into the bargain, to write without his leave. I've written to her now and then, but I've had no news from home since the day I left it, except this that you've brought me to-night."

"And I suppose your uncle has left you a legacy?"

"I suppose so, sir; it isn't likely to be much, anyhow, for I never was any great favorite of his."

"You'd better write to these lawyers, though. There's a mail to-morrow; bring out your desk and write at once."

"Here, sir?"

"Yes, here."

Francis Tredethlyn hesitated for a moment, but seeing that his master was resolute, he brought a clumsy, old-fashioned mahogany desk from his chamber at the back of the cottage, and seated himself at a corner of the table with the desk before him. He had placed himself at a very respectful distance from Mr. Harcourt Lowther, but that gentleman, having finished his pipe, got up and began to walk slowly up and down the room, while his valet squared his elbows and began to write.

"Tell them that you are Francis Tredethlyn, nephew of Oliver Tredethlyn, and that you can bring forward plenty of witnesses to prove your identity, and so on, as soon as you can get back to England. I don't suppose they'll let you have your legacy till they see you. Ask them to tell you what the amount is, at any rate."

Mr. Lowther did not confine himself to giving his valet these hints upon the composition of his letter; he was good enough to stand behind the young man's chair, and look over his shoulder as he wrote; but as Francis Tredethlyn's penmanship was not of a very rapid order, the ensign's eyes soon wandered from the page, and straying to an open division of the desk, lighted on something that looked like a water-colored sketch, covered with silver paper.

"Why, you sly dog," he cried with a laugh, "you've got a woman's picture in your desk."

Francis Tredethlyn blushed and looked very sheepish as he took the little water-colored sketch out of its silver paper envelope and handed it submissively to his master.

"It's my cousin Susan's portrait, sir," he said; "it was taken by a travelling artist, who came down our way one summer. It isn't much of a likeness, but it pleases me to look at it sometimes, for I can fill up all that's wanting in the face out of my own mind, and see my cousin smiling at me, as if I was at home again."

Mr. Lowther stood behind his servant's chair looking at the portrait, while the soldier went on writing. It was a stiff, laborious little portrait of a girl with hazel brown eyes and smooth banded brown hair, and an innocent childish mouth, rosy and fresh and smiling as a summer's morning in the country. It was only the picture of a country girl, who seemed to have looked shyly at the artist as he painted her.

"So that's your cousin Susy," said Mr. Lowther, laying the picture down upon the table by Tredethlyn's elbow. "I shan't stop while you address your letter, and I don't want anything more, so you can go to bed at once if you like. Good night."

The ensign took a candle from a little side table as he spoke, lighted it at the lamp above Tredethlyn's head, and went out of the room. Francis finished his letter, and placed it on the mantelpiece, where some letters of his master's were lying ready for the next day's mail. He did not go to bed at once, though it was late, and he was free to do so, but sat for some time with his cousin Susan Tredethlyn's portrait in his hand, looking at the girlish face and thinking of the changes that had come to pass in his old home.

"The old chap was hard and stern with her, and her life was a dull one, poor little girl," thought the soldier; "and she'll have a fine fortune, I suppose, now he's gone; but somehow I don't like to think of her left lonely in the world; she's too young, and too pretty and too innocent for that. Innocent! why, bless her poor tender little heart, I don't think she knows there's such a wickedness upon this earth."

FAITHFUL TO COPY.—Another eccentric creature died this week who may be instanced as an example of the stupidity attained by some clerks in the government offices. This man was eccentric from the absolutely unintelligent way he would copy anything regularly set before him. Reason seemed actually to have abdicated her throne in his mind. A memorable example of his dulness was often told on him. In 1842 an extensive conflagration spread ruin in the town where he was employed and it occurred just on the eve of the meeting of the General Council. There was such confusion and distress in the town that the Prefect determined to postpone the meeting of the General Council for a fortnight. He drew this rough draught of a notice to the members of the General Council: "Sir—The confusion and distress of—are so great I have thought proper to adjourn the meeting of the General Council until the 15th instant." As the poor creature who just died wrote a beautiful hand he was selected to copy this notice. Some wag knowing his stupidity took advantage of his momentary absence from his desk to substitute this rough draught: "Sir—The confusion and distress of—are so great in consequence of the recent conflagration I have thought proper to adjourn the eclipse of the sun until the 15th instant." He copied this note thirty-six times, placed it in a huge envelope and sealed it with the official seal. You may imagine the laughter.—Paris Correspondence.

NOTICE

The publication of "THE CALIFORNIAN" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

* * Correspondents will address all business communications to "THE CALIFORNIAN," No. 328 Montgomery street, San Francisco. All contributions intended for the paper, and all communications that concern its editorial conduct, direct to C. H. WEBB, editor "CALIFORNIAN," as above.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1864.

AGENTS FOR "THE CALIFORNIAN."

Messrs. WHITE & BAUER, News Dealers, on Washington street, nearly opposite the Post-office, are Agents for THE CALIFORNIAN in the interior counties of this State; also, Nevada, Oregon, Washington and Idaho Territories, and the Pacific Coast.

"SENSATIONAL NOVELS."

THE "sensational novel" seems to have become as much a necessity of the age as rifled guns and breech-loading detonators. Inveigh against them as much as we will, they have entirely taken the places of the good, easy, steady-going novels which flourished in the same era in which smooth-bores, flint-locks, and muzzle-loaders found favor. Novel reading used to be very much like travelling by stage; once embarked, the reader was coached leisurely and smoothly along, only stopping occasionally to change horses at the end of a chapter, or to ascertain the distance to the end of the journey by reference to the pages of the book. There was order and system about the conveyance, and the feelings were never needlessly harrowed up or excited. The novel of to-day, on the other hand, is an express train, with a dozen connections on the road which have to be made at all risks, and we have the rattle and jar of the cars and the smoke and steam and thunder, as well as the abounding oily smell, of the engine. Vice was punished; virtue came inevitably by its own, and every one was happily married who deserved to be. Scott somewhat changed the order of things by the hurried action and dramatic intensity which he brought to his work, but even Ivanhoe must be rated slow if measured by the standard of the present day. Anna Radcliffe managed to galvanize our grandfathers, but neither The Mysteries of Udolpho nor The Romance of the Forest would much startle or surprise the readers of any one of Miss Braddon's novels. This tendency of the age to the sensational in literature has been very generally deplored, but it has been no less generally taken advantage of, and we find publishers and authors pulling together in the profitable duty of supplying the popular demand.

Of the "sensational novel," Miss Braddon and Mrs. Ellen Wood are the very high-priestesses. Wilkie Collins and Pierce Egan, notwithstanding their most earnest endeavors to attain to the distinction, have but barely succeeded in entering the purlieus of the temple, while these two ladies dwell under the very shadow of the altar. We do not know that the feminine mind more than the masculine is fitted by nature for the framing of impossible situations and the elaboration of cruel and inscrutable mysteries, but it cannot be denied that at the present moment the honors and odd trick in the game belong to the ladies. In Lady Audley's Secret, for instance, we have one of the most charmingly impossible plots and most deliciously involved stories that the human mind in its wildest moments could conceive. All the characters move about in the dark from beginning to end, knocking their heads against each other without any motive, and doing the wickedest and strangest and most incomprehensible things for the attainment of no apparent or adequate end. Lady Audley's Secret is Miss Braddon's book and East Lynne is Mrs. Ellen Wood's, but so much alike are they that a criticism of the one applies with equal force to the other—the principal characters go knocking their heads together in the dark and stumbling about generally, without seeming to have any definite intentions—honorable or otherwise—so far as regards either their neighbors or themselves, never, by any chance, doing what such characters would be apt to do in real life. Perhaps it is from this that the delightful mist and mysteries arise, for us none of the characters ever do what sensible people in similar situations would, it is of course impossible to tell how the story is to end, and the reader's ingenuity is constantly exercised from title-page to colophon. We are constantly startled by seeing somebody do what not one of us would ever dream of doing under similar circumstances.

The stage demands sensations, and we see Boucicault dramas and Braddon dramatizations supplanting Shakspeare and driving Sheridan and all of that school into retirement. Blue fire and mystery are demanded, and poetry and wit become only secondary needs, if needed at all. It is idle to expect that any individual will endeavor to correct the popular taste when it is so much easier to supply it. Yielding to the expressed wishes of scores of our subscribers, we commence with this number the publication of Miss Braddon's last novel, ONLY A CLOUD, simultaneously with its appearance in a leading London periodical. Like the majority of that lady's works, it is sufficiently thrilling to admit of publication in a serial form, exciting the reader's interest so that it is carried over from one week's end to another, much as a buggy going down hill requires enough velocity at the bottom to propel it on its way up the next. Each week we shall furnish two pages of the story—the size of THE CALIFORNIAN enabling us to do this without encroaching at all upon other matters.

A WORD ABOUT UMBRELLAS.

TWO men have been convicted in the Police Court of stealing umbrellas and sentenced to the County Jail. To the Police Judge we say, "O righteous Judge, truly a Daniel come to judgment!" For it has been too long held that umbrellas are not property; we rejoice to learn that at last this dogma is exploded. It in no wise diminishes our gratification over this result to know that the offenders were Chinamen, for we feel confident that it was a blow at the crime which was designed and not a reproof to the nationality.

Why the theft of umbrellas has so long been tolerated we are unable to determine. To take the coat or the hat of another is considered a serious thing in the eye of the law, and even indiscretions with pocket handkerchiefs have involved surreptitious borrowers in serious trouble. How and why is the line of demarcation to be drawn? Shakspeare hints that "he who steals my purse takes trash"—and so he does if there chances to be nothing in it. But on the other hand, he who takes an umbrella in a rain storm takes that which not enriches him but leaves the owner wet indeed. Instances may occur where the crime amounts to murder. Suppose that a man takes cold by being obliged to walk home in a rain storm after having his umbrella purloined, and that that cold settles upon his lungs and he dies of consumption. Does any one imagine that in such case the umbrella taker is not responsible for that man's death? Certainly he is, and the Jury who would not pronounce him so and return against him a verdict of murder in the first degree should be sentenced themselves to sit that and all subsequent sessions through in a rain-storm.

Umbrella stealing, a sin all the world over, assumes the proportions of a double crime in this country where there is no let-up to the rains when they once set in. Elsewhere it is possible to remedy the loss: a little patience sees an end to the shower, and a chance of getting dry-shod to a store where umbrellas are sold, but here the case is different. Robbed of an umbrella, one is in somewhat the position that Noah would have occupied had he been deprived of his Ark at the commencement of that critical shower—the water rapidly rising and not time to build another. In this climate an umbrella is a luxury that has to be summered through—kept as skates are kept in rigorous northern climes. And to be deprived of an umbrella that has been carefully guarded all the summer through, just as the first rain sets in, by some losel probably whom a good washing would do no harm, is a vexation which passes the bounds of human patience and necessitates for its calm endurance the exercise of those heroic and angelic virtues which go to make up saints.

A special punishment should be provided for the Crime against Umbrellas. The convicted thief should not be incarcerated in a cell with other felons, for he might inoculate them with his vice, and it is an insurable one. He should be forbidden shelter from rain under penalty of having his ears cropped, and on his brow should be branded in legible and large letters: BEWARE OF THIS MAN; HE IS AN UMBRELLA SHARP!

THE Morning Call has inaugurated a new style of publishing divorces, and we now see "Births," "Marriages," "Divorees" and "Deaths" following each other in regular order. This is systematizing the thing. It is rather novel to think that divorcees are so plenty in our Courts as to nearly balance the births, marriages and deaths, making it necessary to classify them in the same order, but such seems to be the fact. Whether it be the fault of the climate or not we are unable to say, but somehow marriages in California do not seem to stick, and one is often reminded of Saxe's lines apropos of—

Till Death the union shall sever—
For Death is cheated sometimes by Divorce,
A fact which gives an equivocal force
To that beautiful phrase, "Forever."

Our French friends are very apt to get things mixed up when they attempt to grapple with the English language, and consequently their translations must be received with a deal of allowance—especially when they concern the current items of the day. One of the most amusing mistakes we remember to have noticed is found in L'Union Franco-Americaine of last week. That paper pluckily announces that "the journal which has attacked in its daily columns (we translate literally) Mr. George Coppin, our celebrated actor, only did so with the object of extorting money from him, but happily did not succeed. Mr. Coppin has replied, in which we blame him, (en cela ji le blame) because to reply to these ignoble people is to dirty oneself uselessly." It will be seen that L'Union has confused McCoppin the Supervisor with Coppin the comedian, strangely, construing a political raid by a morning paper upon the one into a professional attack upon the other.

DRAMATIC MENTION.

ON Monday evening, Miss Fanny Brown made her début before a Californian audience at Maguire's Opera House, as "Pocahontas," in Brongham's extravaganza of that name, and "Bob Nettles," in the afterpiece of The Jubilee House. The rain throughout the day flooded the streets, and the evening was by no means a pleasant one, but "first appearances" have a peculiar charm for our people, and an excellent house was out in spite of the unpropitious weather. We can scarcely chronicle a success for the lady, though we do not intend to stamp the début as a failure. It was simply a mistake. The lady is pretty and pleasing in person, easy and graceful in dress and demeanor, and as one of the company would have won upon the sympathies of the audience at once. But when a star is presented for consideration, people are very apt to be critical, and both telescope and microscope are brought into play. Miss Brown appeared as a candidate for stellar honors—honors which are never easy—and it was evident from the first that so far as being a star was concerned, the audience did not incline to see her in that light. It may be that of the abounding cold water that fell during the day and evening, a sprinkling had dampened their enthusiasm, or, what is likelier still, it may be that the lady had been injudiciously heralded. It is never well to lead people to expect too much; a violation of this common-sense rule is always followed by a penalty. When Artemus Ward—a really clever man and a genuine humorist—came to this coast, he had to struggle under the disadvantage of too much preliminary puffing; and Niagara Falls—will our friend the Showman pardon us for mentioning them in the same breath?—have disappointed thousands simply because expectation of their grandeur and sublimity had been too much nourished by injudicious admirers. But to take a fresher instance—the case of our débutante. Weeks before her actual appearance the walls were covered with placards and posters announcing the arrival of "THE QUEEN OF COMEDY AND SONG, THE SUCCESSOR TO MRS. JOHN WOOD." Now, "the Queen of Comedy and Song" in itself implies much, but of "the successor to Mrs. John Wood" a great deal would be demanded, as well. With the latter lady our public were familiar; and so great a favorite was she with theatre-goers that the simple mention of any other performer as her rival or successor would be certain to provoke comparison disadvantageous to the claims of the contestant for her place unless based upon great and actual merit. The injudiciousness of being thus heralded was evinced in Miss Brown's reception on Monday evening. To have appeared without a flourish of trumpets would have secured an immediate success as a pretty and accomplished little actress, a valuable addition to any stock company, but her being presented as a star went very far towards preventing the public from giving her that recognition which is legitimately her due. When we say that Mrs. Perry could have carried off the role of "Pocahontas" better than Miss Brown did, it will be seen how unwise was the institution in advance between the débutante and Mrs. John Wood, of a comparison which turned out altogether to the advantage of the latter. The rollicking humor and abandon of Mrs. Wood in the extravagant parts in which her principal successes have been won, find a much nearer representative in Mrs. Perry than in Miss Brown; and with this palpable fact before their eyes, any enthusiastic demonstration on the part of the audience towards the "Pocahontas" of the piece could not be expected. We fancy that Miss Brown doubted her own ability to fulfil the programme laid out for her in the disputation of the dramatic crown, for she seemed doubtful of the audience at first, and that constraint and reserve, which seems to be always her peculiarity of manner, became painfully evident, making the contrast between her own style, and that of the lady whose successor she assumed to be, greater than it would have been under wholly normal conditions.

As a general rule and the result of repeated experiments, it may be written down that no stock actor can successfully star in California. All the East seems to labor under a different impression; but the sooner that impression is corrected the better. A San Francisco audience is quite as critical as a New York one, and too familiar by far with excellent stock actors to be taken by storm by any one that branches off from a New York company. Mrs. Judah, Mrs. Saunders, Mrs. Perry, Mrs. Edwin, Mrs. Judah—we have not space to enumerate all who deserve mention, but their names are fresh on our pen—are our own; all are excellent stock actresses, but we are unaware that any one of them has ever attempted to star even the adjacent town of Oakland, though a wider range might be essayed by them without presumption. We have no hesitation in saying that New York at the present time does not possess an actress who in her own peculiar line of characters can approach Mrs. Judah; but, for all that, we would not advise her to appear in the Metropolis of the Atlantic as the successor to Charlotte Cushman, and we imagine that it would be difficult for any injudicious friend to persuade her to make that attempt. Modesty has always its exceeding great reward. For our part, we are tired of the whole star system; we look upon all the meteoric phenomena in which managers indulge with great and growing suspicion, and we are prepared to joyfully welcome the day when there shall be neither a star nor a bad stock-actor in the land. We imagine that these two results will be reached simultaneously.

Pocahontas was excellently put upon the stage; and well played throughout, the members of the company rhetorically kicking up their heels in its broad fun and shaking the Shakspeare they had previously been laced up in, as supporters of the Keans, from their shoulders as though "the legitimate drama" were a burden—sometimes it is. Pocahontas, by the way, has been localized, and very happily, too, the Californian phrases and political allusions bringing down the house repeatedly. As "Bob Nettles" Miss Brown appeared to better advantage than in the preceding piece, and she decidedly improves upon acquaintance, the constraint of manner noticeable at first vanishing as she becomes familiarized with her audience, until we fancy that a few evenings more will see her thoroughly en rapport with them. She is certainly one of the prettiest women that has graced the stage for many a long day. As "Waddilove" in this same play Mrs. Perry furnished a capital piece of acting, offering, however, in her make up, a strong and strange contrast to the graceful outlines her figure presented when she played the Tartar Prince. Frank Mayo, who took the part of the old Frenchman, did so exceedingly well, and managed so completely to sink and forget Mayo in the character, that we do him but justice when we write him a hearty word of praise: and in this connection we cannot forbear expressing our surprise that the critic of one of the dailies censures his personation of the character, for to our thinking his "Monsieur Tourbillon" is fairly entitled to warm commendation. To say that Lulu Sweet looked as pretty as a pink both pieces through, is simply to give her credit for something which she cannot help. This afternoon and evening, and tomorrow evening, Pocahontas and The day after the Wedding will rule at the Opera House; on Monday evening the musical extravaganza of The Invisible Prince; or, the Isle of Tranquil Delights will be produced, Miss Brown as the Prince.

At the Metropolitan, The Siege of Troy occupied the stage until Thursday night, when it was withdrawn to make room for a dramatization of Pierce Egan's romance, The Poor Girl. We were not at all sorry to see The Siege of Troy raised, for while others found fault with it on the score of impropriety it only suggested itself to us as being dreadfully dull; we never quite understood before what a heavy weight Troy-weight is until the illustration at the Metropolitan. We had no idea previously that the gods and goddesses of the good old times were so fearfully slow; and our respect for Agamemnon, Achilles, Ajax, Hector, Priam, and other eminent Greeks and Trojans, was considerably diminished by the revelation of their terrible addiction to spouting verse in season and out of season. The piece was put upon the stage with a care and scenic effect worthy of better material.

Those people, however, who went to the Metropolitan on Thursday evening, under the mistaken idea, (perhaps induced by the strictures of the daily press regarding the classic costumes of the gone goddesses and Greeks,) that The Poor Girl would be too poor to indulge in many clothes, were mistaken, for the clever and beautiful leading actress of that theatre has as many and as handsome clothes as any lady in the profession, if she chooses to wear them. In The Poor Girl she returned to that costume she is eminently calculated to adorn, and we hail the return with pleasure, for long clothes may decidedly be termed her strong suit. Of the play itself we can only say that it is impossible to dramatize a long novel, intricate in plot, so as to retain the interest and tell the story clearly. It has been tried very often, but only in Aurora Floyd was a partial success achieved. In any event it will be hard to make a public, the majority of whom are bachelors and marrying men, incline very seriously to a Poor Girl or see the romance of one—try them with a rich one, manager. This afternoon the Metropolitan will revive The Siege of Troy for the benefit of families. Milton's Mask of Comus is in rehearsal for speedy production.

The Eureka, despite the defection of a minstrel, flourishes finely—indeed we do not know but what the absence of the harpist is rather a matter of congratulation than otherwise. Backus continues his excellent impersonations (Kean himself taught him how to do Kean;) Birch is as pleasant in his bark as ever; Wambold doesn't go back at all on his Dutch, and still the dancers agitate their clogs. The farce of The Wandering Minstrel is being played—pity that the tragedy of one had not been put in rehearsal.

INCENDIARISM IN NEW YORK.—A telegram dated New York, November 26th, states that the St. Nicholas, St. James, LaFarge, Metropolitan, Astor, Lovejoy's and Belmont Hotels, were fired by incendiaries the night previous, but the damage done was trifling. In the hotels the bed clothes, and some trunks were found covered with phosphorous; matches were also scattered in the beds; the fires were set and the rooms locked. Perhaps they are fired by delinquent boarders as the easiest way of settling their bills. The Occidental, Lick and Russ had better be watchful unless times improve.

It is stated that Grass Valley was visited by a shower of angle-worms on Wednesday night of last week. We trust that they were right-angle worms. If that sort of thing goes on the people of the Valley will have to seek refuge or vernifuge, speedily.

LUCRETIA SMITH'S SOLDIER.

[NOTE FROM THE AUTHOR.—Mr. Editor: I am an ardent admirer of those nice, sickly war stories in Harper's Weekly, and for the last three months I have been at work upon one of that character, which I now forward to you for publication. It can be relied upon as true in every particular, inasmuch as the facts it contains were compiled from the official records in the War Department at Washington. The credit of this part of the labor is due to the Hon. T. G. Phelps, who has so long and ably represented this State in Congress. It is but just, also, that I should make honorable mention of the obliging publishing firms Roman & Co. and of Bancroft & Co., of this city, who loaned me Jomini's Art of War, the Message of the President and Accompanying Documents, and sundry maps and military works, so necessary for reference in building a novel like this. To the accommodating Directors of the Overland Telegraph Company I take pleasure in returning my thanks for tendering me the use of their wires at the customary rates. The inspiration which enabled me in this production to soar so happily into the realms of sentiment and soft emotion, was obtained from the excellent beer manufactured at the New York Brewery, in Sutter street, between Montgomery and Kearney. And finally, to all those kind friends who have, by good deeds or encouraging words, assisted me in my labors upon this story of "Lucretia Smith's Soldier," during the past three months, and whose names are too numerous for special mention, I take this method of tendering my sincerest gratitude.

CHAPTER I.

ON a balmy May morning in 1861, the little village of Bluemass, in Massachusetts, lay wrapped in the splendor of the newly-risen sun. Reginald de Whittaker, confidential and only clerk in the house of Bushrod & Ferguson, general dry goods and grocery dealers, and keepers of the Post-office, rose from his bunk under the counter and shook himself. After yawning and stretching comfortably, he sprinkled the floor and proceeded to sweep it. He had only half finished his task, however, when he sat down on a keg of nails and fell into a reverie. "This is my last day in this shanty," said he. "How it will surprise Lucretia when she hears I am going for a soldier! How proud she will be—the little darling!" He pictured himself in all manner of warlike situations; the hero of a thousand extraordinary adventures; the man of rising fame; the pet of Fortune at last; and beheld himself, finally, returning to his old home, a bronzed and scarred Brigadier-General, to cast his honors and his matured and perfect love at the feet of his Lucretia Borgia Smith.

At this point a thrill of joy and pride suffused his system—but he looked down and saw his broom, and blushed. He came toppling down from the clouds he had been soaring among, and was an obscure clerk again, on a salary of two dollars and a half a week.

CHAPTER II.

At 8 o'clock that evening, with a heart palpitating with the proud news he had brought for his beloved, Reginald sat in Mr. Smith's parlor awaiting Lucretia's appearance. The moment she entered he sprang to meet her, his lace lighted by the torch of love that was blazing in his head somewhere and shining through, and ejaculated "Mine own!" as he opened his arms to receive her.

"Sir!" said she, and drew herself up like an offended queen. Poor Reginald was stricken dumb with astonishment. This chilling demeanor, this angry rebuff where he had expected the old, tender welcome, banished the gladness from his heart as the cheerful brightness is swept from the landscape when a dark cloud drifts athwart the face of the sun. He stood bewildered a moment, with a sense of goodness on him like one who finds himself suddenly overboard upon a midnight sea and beholds the ship pass into shrouding gloom, while the dreadful conviction falls upon his soul that he has not been missed. He tried to speak, but his pallid lips refused their office. At last he murmured:

"O, Lucretia, what have I done—what is the matter—why this cruel coldness? Don't you love your Reginald any more?"

Her lips curled in bitter scorn, and she replied, in mocking tones:

"Don't I love my Reginald any more? No, I don't love my Reginald any more! Go back to your pitiful junk shop and grab your pitiful yard-stick, and stuff cotton in your ears so that you can't hear your country shout to you to fall in and shoulder arms! Go!" And then, unheeding the new light that flashed from his eyes, she fled from the room and slammed the door behind her.

Only a moment more! Only a single moment more, he thought, and he could have told her how he had already answered the summons and signed his name to the muster-roll, and all would have been well—his lost bride would have come back to his arms with words of praise and thanksgiving upon her lips. He made a step forward, once, to recall her, but he remembered that he was no longer an effeminate dry-goods student, and his warrior soul scorned to sue for quarter. He strode from the place with martial firmness, and never looked back on him.

CHAPTER III.

WHEN Lucretia awoke the next morning, the faint music of a fife and the roll of a distant drum came floating upon the soft spring breeze, and as she listened the sounds grew more subdued and finally passed out of hearing. She lay absorbed in thought for many minutes, and then she sighed and said, "Oh, if he were only with that band of fellows, how I could love him!"

In the course of the day a neighbor dropped in, and when the conversation turned upon the soldiers, the visitor said:

"Reginald de Whittaker looked rather down-hearted, and didn't shout when he marched along with the other boys this morning. I expect it's owing to you, Miss Loo, though when I met him coming here yesterday evening to tell you he'd enlisted, he thought you'd like it and be proud of—Mercy! what in the nation's the matter with the girl?"

Nothing, only a sudden misery had fallen like a blight upon her heart, and a deadly pallor telegraphed it to her countenance. She rose up without a word and walked with a firm step out of the room, but once within the sacred seclusion of her own chamber, her strong will gave way and she burst into a flood of passionate tears. Bitterly she upbraided herself for her foolish haste of the night before, and her harsh treatment of her lover at the very moment that he had come to anticipate the proudest wish of her heart, and to tell her that he had enrolled himself under the battle-flag and was going forth to fight as her soldier. Alas! other maidens would have soldiers in those glorious fields, and be entitled to the sweet pain of feeling a tender solicitude for them, but she would be unrepresented. No soldier in all the vast armies would breathe her name as he breasted the crimson tide of war! She wept again—or, rather, she went on weeping where she left off a moment before. In her bitterness of spirit, she almost cursed the precipitancy that had brought all this sorrow upon her young life. "Drat it!" The words were in her bosom, but she locked them there, and closed her lips against their utterance.

For weeks and weeks she nursed her grief in silence while the roses faded from her cheeks. And through it all she clung to the hope that some day the old love would bloom again in Reginald's heart, and he would write to her—but the long summer days dragged wearily along, and still no letter came. The newspapers teemed with stories of battle and carnage, and eagerly she read them, but always with the same result: the tears welled up and blurred the closing lines—the name she sought was looked for in vain, and the dull aching returned to her sinking heart. Letters to the other girls sometimes contained brief mention of him, and presented always the same picture of him—a morose, unsmiling, desperate man, always in the thickest of the fight, begrimed with powder, and moving calm and unscathed through tempests of shot and shell, as if he bore a charmed life.

But at last, in a long list of maimed and killed, poor Lucretia read these terrible words, and fell fainting to the floor: "R. D. Whittaker, private soldier, desperately wounded!"

CHAPTER IV.

ON a couch in one of the wards of a hospital at Washington lay a wounded soldier; his head was so profusely bandaged that his features were not visible, but there was no mistaking the happy face of the young girl who sat beside him—it was Lucretia Borgia Smith's. She had haunted him out several weeks before, and since that time she had patiently watched by him and nursed him, coming in the morning as soon as the surgeons had finished dressing his wounds, and never leaving him until relieved at nightfall. A ball had shattered his lower jaw, and he could not utter a syllable; through all her weary vigils, she had never once been blessed with a grateful word from his dear lips; yet she stood to her post bravely and without a murmur, feeling that when he did get well again she would hear that which would more than reward her for all her devotion.

At the hour we have chosen for the opening of this chapter, Lucretia was in a tumult of happy excitement, for the surgeon had told her that at last her Whittaker had recovered sufficiently to admit of the removal of the bandages from his head, and she was now waiting with feverish impatience for the doctor to come and disclose the loved features to her view. At last he came, and Lucretia, with beaming eyes and a fluttering heart, bent over the couch with anxious expectancy. One bandage was removed, then another, and another, and lo! the poor wounded face was revealed to the light of day.

"O my own dar—"

What have we here! What is the matter! Alas! it was the face of a stranger!

Poor Lucretia! With one hand covering her upturned eyes, she staggered back with a moan of anguish. Then a spasm of fury distorted her countenance as she brought her fist down with a crash that made the medicine bottles on the table dance again, and exclaimed:

"O confound my cats if I haven't gone and fooled away three mortal weeks here, snuffling and slobbering over the wrong soldier!"

It was a sad, sad truth. The wretched, but innocent and unwitting impostor was R. D., or Richard Dilworthy Whittaker, of Wisconsin, the soldier of dear little Eugenie Le Mulligan, of that State, and utterly unknown to our unhappy Lucretia B. Smith.

Such is life, and the tail of the serpent is over us all. Let us draw the curtain over this melancholy history—for melancholy it must still remain, during a season at least, for the real Reginald de Whittaker has not turned up yet.

MARK TWAIN

HARDRESS FITZGERALD.

IN an old Dublin University Magazine, among other articles of interest we find a narrative of the singular adventures of Hardress Fitzgerald, an eminent Irish royalist, who contrived to elude the strictest search for his person, after the battle of the Boyne had all but annihilated his party. The narrative, from which we propose to make a short extract, purports to be written by the hero himself, and commences with an amusing account of his living in disguise in Dublin; it then proceeds to state, that, becoming anxious to join the wreck of King James's forces in Limerick, he ventured on travelling across the country as a peddler; how, while on the way, he had an interview with Gen. Sarsfield, and received from him certain papers to convey to the unhappy royalists; after which, on pursuing his journey, he had the misfortune to fall into the hands of some soldiers, and was brought before Capt. Oliver, a leader in the ranks of his opponents. At this point we shall allow him to tell his story in his own words, which give one a fearful idea of the cruelties committed at that disastrous period in Ireland:

"Unbuckle your pack," exclaimed the corporal; "unbuckle your pack, fellow, and show your goods to the captain—here where you are."

I proceeded to present my merchandise to the loving contemplation of the officers, who thronged around me with a kind of dubious inquiring gaze. "I think, my honest fellow," he said at last, "that I have seen you somewhere before this. Have you often dealt with the military?" "I have traded, sir," said I, "with the soldiery many a time, and always been honorably treated. Will your worship please to buy a pair of lace ruffles?—very cheap, your worship." "Why do you wear your hair so much over your face, sir?" said Oliver, without noticing my suggestion. "I promise you, I think no good of you; throw back your hair, and let me see you plainly. Hold up your face, and look straight at me; throw back your hair, sir."

I felt that all chance of escape was at an end, and stepping forward as near as the table would allow me to him, I raised my head, threw back my hair, and fixed my eyes sternly and boldly upon his face. I saw that he knew me instantly, for his countenance turned as pale as ashes with surprise and hatred; he started up, placing his hand instinctively upon his sword-hilt, and glaring at me with a look so deadly, that I thought every moment he would strike his sword into my heart. He said in a kind of whisper, "Hardress Fitzgerald?" "Yes," said I boldly, for the excitement of the scene had effectually stirred my blood, "Hardress Fitzgerald is before you. I know you well, Capt. Oliver. I know you hate me. I know how you thirst for my blood; but in a good cause, and in the hands of God, I defy you." "You are a desperate villain, sir," said Captain Oliver; "a rebel and a murderer. Holloa there, guard, seize him!" As the soldiers entered, I threw my eyes hastily round the room, and observing a glowing fire upon the hearth, suddenly drew General Sarsfield's packet from my bosom, and casting it upon the embers, planted my foot upon it. "Secure the papers," said the captain, and almost instantly I was laid prostrate and senseless upon the floor by a blow from the butt of a carbine.

I cannot say how long I continued in a state of torpor; but, at length, having slowly recovered my senses, I found myself lying firmly handcuffed upon the floor of a small chamber, through a narrow loophole in one of whose walls the evening sun was shining. I was chilled with cold and damp, and drenched in blood, which had flowed in large quantities from the wound on my head. By a strong effort I shook off the sick drowsiness which still hung upon me, and weak and giddy I rose with pain and difficulty to my feet. The chamber or rather cell in which I stood, was about eight feet square, and of a height very disproportioned to its other dimensions—its altitude from the floor to the ceiling being not less than twelve or fourteen feet. A narrow slit placed high in the wall admitted a scanty light, but sufficient to assure me that my prison contained nothing to render the sojourn of its tenant a whit less comfortable than my worst enemy could have wished. My first impulse was naturally to examine the security of the door—the loophole which I have mentioned being too high and too narrow to afford a chance of escape. I listened attentively to ascertain if possible whether or not a guard had been placed upon the outside. Not a sound was to be heard. I now placed my shoulder to the door, and sought with all my combined strength and weight to force it open; it, however, resisted all my efforts, and thus baffled in my appeal to mere animal power, exhausted and disheartened, I threw myself on the ground. It was not in my nature, however, long to submit to the apathy of despair, and in a few minutes I was on my feet again. With patient scrutiny I endeavored to ascertain the nature of the fastenings which secured the door. The planks fortunately having been nailed together fresh, had shrunk considerably, so as to leave wide chinks between each and its neighbor. By means of these apertures, I saw that my dungeon was secured, not by a lock as I had feared, but by a strong wooden bar, running horizontally across the door, about midway upon the outside.

[Contriving to make an opening, he reaches the door of the apartment in which he had been seized, and overhears an order given by Oliver for his execution, which he declared should take place in the evening ere the moon arose.]

There was a kind of glee in Oliver's manner and expression which chilled my very heart. "He shall be first shot like a dog, and then hanged like a dog; shot to-night, and hung to-morrow; hung at the bridge-head; hung, until his bones drop asunder!"

It is impossible to describe the exultation with which he seemed to dwell upon, and to particularise, the fate which he intended for me. A chill, sick horror crept over me as they retired, and I felt, for the moment, upon the brink of swoon-

ing. This feeling, however, speedily gave place to a sensation still more terrible—a state of excitement so intense and tremendous as to border upon literal madness, supervened; my brain reeled and throbbed as if it would burst; thoughts the wildest and the most hideous flashed through my mind with a spontaneous rapidity that scared my very soul; while all the time I felt a strange and frightful impulse to burst into uncontrolled laughter. Gradually this fearful paroxysm passed away. I kneeled and prayed fervently, and felt comforted and assured; but still I could not view the slow approaches of certain death without an agitation little short of agony.

I returned again to the closet in which I had found myself upon recovering from the swoon.

The evening sunshine and twilight was fast melting into darkness, when I heard the outer door, that which communicated with the guard-room in which the officers had been amusing themselves, opened, and locked again upon the inside. A measured step then approached, and the door of the wretched cell in which I lay being rudely pushed open, a soldier entered, who carried something in his hand, but, owing to the obscurity of the place, I could not see what.

"Art thou awake, fellow?" said he, in a gruff voice. "Stir thyself; get upon thy legs." His orders were enforced by no very gentle application of his military boot.

"Friend," said I, rising with difficulty, "you need not insult a dying man. You have been sent hither to conduct me to death. Lead on! My trust is in God, that he will forgive me my sins, and receive my soul, redeemed by the blood of his Son." There here intervened a pause of some length, at the end of which the soldier said, in the same gruff voice, but in a lower key, "Look ye, comrade, it will be your own fault if you die this night. On one condition I promise to get you out of this hobble with a whole skin; but if you go to any of your gammon, before two hours are passed you will have as many holes in your carcass as a target." "Name your conditions," said I; "and if they consist with honor, I will never balk at the offer."

"Here they are; you are to be shot to-night, by Capt. Oliver's orders; the earlines are cleaned for the job, and the cartridges served out to the men. I tell you the truth."

Of this I needed not much persuasion, and intimated to the man my conviction that he spoke the truth.

"Well, then," he continued, "now for the means of avoiding this ugly business. Capt. Oliver rides this night to headquarters, with the papers which you carried. Before he starts he will pay you a visit to fish what he can out of you, with all the fine promises he can make. Humor him a little, and when you find an opportunity, stab him in the throat above the cuirass."

"A feasible plan, surely," said I, raising my shackled hands, "for a man thus completely crippled and without a weapon." "I will manage all that presently for you," said the soldier. "When you have thus dealt with him, take his cloak and hat, and so forth, and put them on; the papers you will find in the pocket of his vest, in a red leather case, walk boldly out—I am appointed to ride with Capt. Oliver; and you will find me holding his horse and my own by the door; mount quickly, and I will do the same, and then we will ride for our lives across the bridge. You will find the holster pistols loaded in case of pursuit, and with the devil's help we shall reach Limerick without a hair hurt. My only condition is, that when you strike Oliver, you strike home, and again and again, until he is finished—and I trust to your honor to remember me when we reach the town."

I cannot say whether I resolved right or wrong, but I thought my situation, and the conduct of Capt. Oliver, warranted me in acceding to the conditions propounded by my visitant, and with alacrity I told him so, and desired him to give me the power, as he had promised to do, of executing him. With speed and promptitude he drew a small key from his pocket, and in an instant the manacles were removed from my hands. How my heart bounded within me as my wrists were released from the iron gripe of the shackles!—the first step towards freedom was made—my self-reliance returned, and I felt assured of success. "Now for the weapon," said I. "I fear me you will find it rather clumsy," said he, "but if well handled it will do as well as the best Toledo; it is the only thing I could get, but I sharpened it myself; it has an edge like a skean."

He placed in my hand the steel head of a halberd, and with a low savage laugh left me to my reflections. Having examined and arranged the weapon, I carefully bound the ends of the cravat with which I had secured the cross part of the spear-head, firmly round my wrist, so that in case of a struggle it might not easily be forced from my hand, and having made these precautionary dispositions, I sat down upon the ground with my back against the wall, and my hands together under my coat, awaiting my visitor. The time wore slowly on; the dusk became dimmer and dimmer, until it nearly bordered on total darkness. "How's this?" said I, inwardly. "Captain Oliver, you said I should not see the moon rise to-night; methinks you are somewhat tardy in the fulfilment of your prophecy." As I made this reflection, a noise at the outer door announced the entrance of a visitant. I knew that the decisive moment was come, and letting my head sink upon my breast, and assuring myself that my hands were concealed, I awaited, in the attitude of deep dejection, the approach of my foe and betrayer. As I had expected, Capt. Oliver entered the room where I lay; he was equipped for instant duty, as far as the imperfect twilight would allow me to see; the long sword clanked upon the floor, as he made his way through the lobbies which led to my place of confinement; his ample military cloak hung upon his arm, his cocked hat was upon his head, and in all points he was prepared for the road. This tallied exactly with what my strange informant had told me. I felt my heart swell and my breath come thick, as the awful moment which was to witness the death-struggle of one or other of us approached. Capt. Oliver stood within a yard or two of the place where I sat, or rather lay, and folding his arms he remained silent for a minute or two, as if arranging in his mind how he should address me.

"Hardress Fitzgerald," he began at length, "are you awake? Stand up if you desire to hear of matters nearly touching your life or death; get up, I say."

I arose, doggedly, and affecting the awkward movements of one whose hands were bound. "Well," said I, "what would you of me? Is it not enough that I am thus imprisoned without a cause, and about, as I suspect, to suffer a most unjust and violent sentence, but must I also be disturbed during the few moments left me for reflection and repentance, by the presence of my persecutor. What do you want of me?"

"As to your punishment, sir," said he, "your own deserts have no doubt suggested the likelihood of it to your mind; but I now am with you to let you know, that whatever mitigation of your sentence you may look for, must be earned by your compliance with my orders. You must frankly and fully explain the contents of the packet which you endeavored this day to destroy; and, further, you must tell all that you know of the designs of the popish rebels."

"And if I do this I am to expect a mitigation of my punishment—is it not so?" Oliver bowed.

"Well, sir, before I make the desired communications, I have one question more to put. What is to befall me, in case that I, remembering the honor of a soldier and a gentleman, reject your infamous terms, scorn your mitigations, and defy your utmost power?" "In that case," replied he coolly, "in half an hour you shall be a corpse."

"Then, God have mercy on your soul," said I, and springing forward, I dashed the weapon which I held at his throat. I missed my aim, but struck him full in the mouth with such force that most of his front teeth were dislodged, and the point of the spear-head passed out under his jaw, at the ear. My onset was so sudden and unexpected that he reeled back to the wall, and did not recover his equilibrium in time to prevent my dealing a second blow, which I did with my whole force; the point unfortunately struck the cuirass, near the neck, and, glancing aside, it inflicted but a flesh wound, tearing the skin and tendons along the throat. He now grappled with me, strange to say, without any cry of alarm. Being a very powerful man, and if anything rather heavier and more strongly built than I, he succeeded in drawing me with him to the ground. We fell together, with a heavy crash, tugging and straining in what we were both conscious was a mortal struggle. At length I succeeded in getting over him, and struck him twice more. The weapon which I wielded had lighted upon the eye, and the point penetrated the brain; the body quivered under me, the deadly grasp relaxed, and Oliver lay upon the ground a corpse! As I arose and shook the weapon and the bloody cloth from my hand, the moon which he had foretold I should never see rise, shone bright and broad into the room, and discolored, with ghastly distinctness, the mangled features of the dead soldier. It is hard to say with what feelings I looked upon the unsightly and revolting mass which had so lately been a living and comely man. I had not any time, however, to spare for reflection; the deed was done; the responsibility was upon me, and all was registered in the book of that God who judges rightly.

With eager haste I removed from the body such of the military accoutrements as were necessary for the purpose of my disguise. I buckled on the sword, drew off the military boots, and donned them myself, placed the brigadier wig and cocked hat upon my head, threw on the cloak, drew it about my face, and proceeded with the papers, which I found as the soldier foretold me, and the key of the outer lobby, to the door of the guard-room; this I opened, and with a firm and rapid tread walked through the officers, who rose as I entered, and passed without question or interruption to the street door. Here I was met by the grim-looking corporal, Hewson, who, saluting me, said, "How soon, captain, shall the file be drawn out, and the prisoner dispatched?" "In half an hour," I replied, without raising my voice. The man again saluted, and in two steps I reached the soldier who held the two horses, as he had intimated. "Is all right?" said he, eagerly. "Ay," said I; "which horse am I to mount?" He satisfied me upon this point, and I threw myself into the saddle; the soldier mounted his horse, and dashing the spurs into the flanks of the animal which I bestrode, we thundered along the narrow bridge. At the far extremity, a sentinel, as we approached, called out, "Who goes there?—stand and give the word!" Heeded of the interruption, with my heart bounding with excitement, I dashed on; so did also the soldier who accompanied me. The sentinel fired.

"Hurrah!" I shouted: "try it again, my boy," and away we went at a gallop, which bade fair to distance everything like pursuit. Never was spur more needed, however; for soon the clatter of horses' hoofs, in full speed, crossing the bridge, came sharp and clear through the stillness of the night. Away we went, with our pursuers close behind. One mile was passed, another nearly completed. The moon now shone forth, and turning in the saddle, I looked back upon the road we had passed. One trooper had headed the rest, and was within a hundred yards of us. I saw the fellow throw himself from his horse upon the ground. I knew his object and said to my comrade, "Lower your body; lie flat over the saddle; the fellow is going to fire." I had hardly spoken when the report of a carbine startled the echoes, and the ball striking the hind leg of my companion's horse, the poor animal fell headlong upon the road, throwing his rider head foremost over the saddle. My first impulse was to stop and share whatever fate might await my comrade; but my second and wiser one was to spur on, and save myself and my despatch. I rode on at a gallop. Turning to observe my comrade's fate, I saw his pursuer, having remounted, ride rapidly up to him, and on reaching the spot where the man and horse lay, rein in and dismount. He was hardly upon the ground, when my companion shot him dead with one of the holster pistols which he had drawn from the pipe, and leaping nimbly over a ditch at the side of the road, he was soon lost among the ditches and thorn bushes which covered that part of the country. Another mile being passed, I had the satisfaction to perceive that the pursuit was given over, and in an hour more I crossed Thomond Bridge, and slept that night in the fortress of Limerick, having delivered the packet, the result of whose safe arrival was the destruction of William's great train of artillery, then upon its way to the besiegers.

Years after this adventure, I met in France a young officer, who I found had served in Capt. Oliver's regiment, and he explained what I had never before understood—the motives of the man who had wrought my deliverance. Strange to say, he was the foster brother of Oliver, whom he thus devoted to death, in revenge for the most grievous wrong which one man can inflict upon another!

THE BACHELOR'S DREAM EXPLAINED.

I think you remember that some months ago,
I was courting a handsome young girl;
Since then I went travelling up country, you know,
And I've now lost the run of my Belle.I loved her so dearly—I do love her yet,
Of course she must know very well;
Indeed, I am ready to go in a fit
Since I've lost the run of my Belle.I've made an inquiry of all the young chaps—
Been searching at every hotel;
I've now and then called on old Schiedam Schuapps
Since I've lost the run of my Belle.Kept running all day like a fool in the street,
To search for another young girl;
And every fine lady I chance for to meet,
I've inquired for my old lover, Belle.I start for a Photographic Gallery,
To look for my sweet little Belle;
And who in the name you think I should see?
A face of that very same girl!I then said, "Dear Belle, I've caught you at last;
Are you lying, or here in disguise?"
And what do you think, my friends, it was?
A picture of her in life size.Now to be seen at H. BUSH'S Gallery, corner of Post, Market and Montgomery streets, entrance opposite the Masonic Hall. oc29-3m

BURDELL'S

Oriental Tooth Wash.

SOUND AND WHITE TEETH

Are Indispensable to Personal Attraction, and to Health and Longevity, by proper mastication of the food.THIS UNIQUE PREPARATION IS OF INESTIMABLE value in preserving and beautifying the Teeth, strengthening the Gums and imparting a delicate fragrance to the breath. It eradicates tartar from the Teeth, removes spots of incipient decay, and polishes and preserves the enamel, to which it imparts a PEARL LIKE WHITENESS.
Its anti-septic and anti-scorbutic properties exercises a highly beneficial and salutary influence; they arrest the further progress of the decay of Teeth, induce a healthy action of the Gums, and cause them to assume the brightness and color indicative of perfect soundness; while, by confining their adhesion to the Teeth, they give unlimited enjoyment and fresh zest to appetite, by perpetuating effective and complete mastication. It speedily removes those ravages which children sustain in the teeth, owing to the improper use of sweet and acid substances.
Sold by all Druggists, and by

Lavender has always maintained the highest rank as a perfume in England, but owing to the inferior qualities usually imported, has almost fallen into disuse in the Uni-

the most delicate and refreshing perfume in use. This preparation is recommended as the pure essence of Garden
Lavender Flowers. sc24

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS.

THE news of the week, given to us with intermissions, leaves little room for doubt that Sherman is pushing vigorously for the Atlantic seaboard. Although nothing definite reaches us, we have rumors from various sources that Macon was invested. A later despatch, however, from the Richmond papers states that Milledgeville was occupied by our troops, and that Sherman, instead of attacking Macon, has passed by that place, and is pressing on his forces with great celerity towards the coast. "It is also rumored that a large fleet is in readiness to co-operate with Sherman, so soon as he reaches his destination. The heavy rains and floods on the James have retarded operations. We continue our telegraphic summary:

November 23.—A despatch from New York gives extracts from Richmond papers stating that Sherman was marching on Macon, and that his advance had reached the outskirts of that city. At Griffin he captured a portion of the Legislature, which was in session there. His army marches with the forces spread out, sweeping a wide space, devastating and ruining all farms. Macon is said to be garrisoned by the Georgia militia, composed mostly of old men and boys.

It is currently reported that Gen. Butler had blown the end out of the canal at Dutch Gap and let the water in.

Picket firing still continues at Petersburg.

November 25.—Another victory for Sheridan. Custar, Powell and Diven, commanding three divisions, made a reconnaissance; Devin marched up Luray valley, Custar and Powell up the Shenandoah, pressing the rebels. On the 22d, they encountered Early's main infantry division, 15,000 strong, and a division of cavalry, at Root Hill. A severe engagement ensued, lasting six hours, during which neither side appear to have gained much advantage. Having accomplished the object of the reconnaissance, the Union forces withdrew, with a loss of about 60 in killed, wounded and missing, without being followed by Early.

Col. Brooks, with 2,500 rebels, attacked Fayetteville, Ark., on the 28th October, and was repulsed with considerable loss. Hazen, with 6,000 of Price's retreating troops, bombarded the town on November 3d, for five hours. The enemy was held at bay till next morning, when Curtis and Blunt arrived, and the rebels skedaddled. On the authority of a missionary accompanying Price, that army lost 10,000 in killed, wounded and deserters, and the expedition was a most disastrous one. Sheridan reported marching on Lynchburg.

Vienna and Fairfax reported to be occupied by our troops. Beauregard issues a proclamation, dated Corinth, the 18th, advising the Georgians to lay waste everything around Sherman, in his front and near his flank, and promising to be with them soon.

On the authority of the Augusta Sentinel, the "Yankee" column had moved down the Georgia divide at Decatur, half going down the Covington road, and the other half the Rock-bridge road at Stone Mountain; all the unoccupied houses and two-thirds of the town were burned.

On the 24th, rebel deserters at City Point reported the occupation of Macon by Sherman. A private despatch from Macon to a Savannah paper, under date of November 21st, says: "The enemy (Federals) crossed the Ocmulgee in force yesterday, at Planter's Factory, 8 miles from Indian Springs. It is reported that they are 30,000 strong. This would seem to strengthen the belief that Augusta is their object. The Central Railroad was destroyed on the 20th, and the telegraph cut. Communication between Savannah and Macon is destroyed. The wires between Gordon and Milledgeville cut."

Hood's army, 300 strong, with ten pieces of artillery, was reported marching on Pulaski on Wednesday. He was supposed to be advancing with the intention of entering East Tennessee, and joining Breckinridge.

A sensation despatch to the New York Herald says that Sherman will meet at Augusta the Governors of North and South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama and Mississippi, and will confer with them in relation to the terms on which these States can repudiate their several ordinances of secession and be once more members of the great family of States.

A Union expedition on the 18th, was attacked and defeated by a rebel force, in the La Fourche district, La.

Richmond papers of the 24th announce that Sherman has occupied Milledgeville. The same authority also asserts that Sherman has passed by Macon, and will move towards the Atlantic coast, without attacking the defenses of Augusta.

In a debate in the rebel House of Representatives, on the 19th, some facts were disclosed which showed a vigorous crusade against the reconstructionists, including Stephens, Boyce, Brown, Leach, Vance, Cobb and Foote, who are denounced as "needless agitators of dangerous questions." The rebel Congress is likened unto a house divided against itself, which cannot long stand against the tornadoes of excitement which Sherman is creating.

Dates from Bermuda of the 19th state that the rebel cruiser Chickamauga had completed her repairs and sailed on the 15th November.

November 28.—Deserters from the rebel army continue to increase, according to the World's Army of the Potomac correspondent, who corroborate the statements that the rebel army is demoralized.

Beauregard's army consists of 25,000 infantry and 15,000 cavalry.

Richmond papers say that a fight occurred between a rebel force and Sherman's cavalry, in which the latter were repulsed.

The Governors of South Carolina and Georgia have issued proclamations calling out all the males of those States between the ages of 16 and 55.

The pirate Florida sunk (by accident) at Hampton Road in nine fathoms of water. She had been run into by an army steamer and badly damaged.

Gen. Thomas, it is reported, has retreated to Franklin, Tenn. Military authorities say that if the report is correct, Thomas is preparing to receive large reinforcements, now on the way to him, before giving battle to Hood.

LOCAL MATTERS OF THE WEEK.

WHEN this paper went to press last week a violent gale was sweeping over the city and harbor, causing considerable damage to the shipping, unroofing houses, tearing away awnings, unhinging signs, destroying shade trees and shrubbery, and raising the mischief generally. From Friday midnight to Wednesday noon last, 6.86 inches of rain fell. Many of the cellars in the lower part of the city were flooded.

On Sunday afternoon a fatal accident happened on Howard street, nearly opposite the Methodist church. Car No. 6, of the Omnibus Railroad, was going eastward, when Richard H. King, a boy about 12 years of age, (son of Mr. Richard King, who resides on Hyde street, near Ellis,) ran suddenly across the street towards the church, holding his hat down over his eyes to shield them from the driving rain; striking heavily against the doubletree behind the horses, he fell on the track and was run over by both wheels on that side before the driver, Hannibal Manter, could stop the car, the track being slippery and the horses restive. The body of the unfortunate boy was almost severed at the waist, and he did not speak after the wheel struck him. His being blind in the left eye, may account for his not seeing the car at all, as it was on that side that he struck. Manter was taken to the station house on a charge of manslaughter, but the Coroner's jury exonerating him from all blame, he was soon after liberated.

Edward E. Powers, President of the Eureka Typographical Union, was taken sick with rheumatic fever, on the 24th November; little thought was entertained that the affair was serious, but on the afternoon of the 27th he sank rapidly, and died before 10 o'clock. Mr. Powers came to California in 1849, and was much respected by his associates in the craft. Capt. Hiram Fairchild, also a pioneer printer, who arrived here in 1849, from New Orleans, died last week, and was buried in the beautiful lot of the Typographical Union in Lone Mountain Cemetery. Capt. F. participated in the Texan Revolution, and subsequently commanded a company of cavalry in Bischoe's Battalion of Louisiana Dragoons, during the Mexican War.

The dead body of a man was found on Wednesday morning in the sand hills near the Cliff House. Deceased was last seen alive Tuesday afternoon; he then seemed to be laboring under delirium tremens, as he thought some one intended killing him; he also said he was a mason or plasterer, but did not give his name. The body is that of a man 5 feet 6 inches high, sandy hair and whiskers, aged about 30 years. It was dressed in black coat and pants, black satin vest with black silk stripes, checked overshirt, white wool undershirt, Congress boots, black necktie with red and white stripes, and black glazed cap. No marks of poison or evidences of violence were found, and no papers to indicate the name. The man probably died from exposure. [Since the foregoing was put in type, the body has been identified as that of Matthias O'Connell, from Troy, N. Y., a plasterer by trade. He was sick with chills and fever on Sunday last.]

On Thursday afternoon, a workman engaged in repairing the roof of the building adjoining THE CALIFORNIAN office, southeast corner of Montgomery and California streets, fell from the top of the building a distance of 40 feet, breaking through the plank sidewalk, and landing in the cellar beneath. No bones were broken, and a few minutes after the man went his way, rejoicing at his miraculous escape from instant death.

On Wednesday evening, the Sons of Scotia celebrated the second anniversary of the organization of the St. Andrew's Society, with a grand festival at one of our principal hotels. Among the guests were Gen. McDowell, Hon. W. L. Booker, the British Consul, and other distinguished gentlemen.

An unknown man jumped off Meiggs' Wharf, Wednesday afternoon, with the evident intention of committing suicide. He floated some distance with the tide, and was then rescued by Sweeney & Baugh's marine reporters' boat, and taken to the hospital.

On Tuesday morning at about half-past ten o'clock, J. F. Curle entered the room of Charles Stevens, over Barrett & Sherwood's store, and for some trifling cause drew a pistol and fired four shots at him. They all took effect, but none of the wounds are serious. Curle was admitted to bail in the sum of $2,500. Both Curle and Stevens are young men.

A clerk in the Medical Purveyor's Department, U. S. A., on this coast, named Frank Rivers, was arrested on Tuesday, on a charge of having forged two checks on the Assistant U. S. Treasurer.

John Gallagher shouted for Jeff Davis and was arrested therefor, and on Tuesday he was examined in the Police Court on the charge of "uttering treasonable language." He was held to answer before the County Court, in $500 bail.

The annual Fair of the Sisters of Charity for the benefit of the orphans will open on this evening at Platt's Hall, and continue for one week. We hope the public at large will bear in mind the charitable intention of the Fair.

The Morning Call entered on its seventeenth volume last Thursday morning. The paper has proved a "decided success."

The Superintendent of the Mint gives notice that deposits of fine bars or bullion will be received for coinage after the closing for a settlement, till the tenth day of December, 1864.

The Citizen's Gas Company have received the material for their meter, and it is nearly ready to be placed.

A fire broke out in the upper story of the Mechanics' Exchange, a boarding-house, No. 25 Third street, about five o'clock yesterday morning, destroying the upper story and furniture, and causing the death of a lodger named Thomas Hayes, by suffocation. W. H. Brooks occupied a portion of the first story as a news depot. His loss was but slight.

The stranger found dead on Leidesdorff street on Wednesday, November 23d, was incorrectly reported by all the daily papers as a Mr. Nichols, from Barry county, Illinois. That gentleman naturally desires to have the error corrected.

The Pacific Christian Commission acknowledge the receipt of $1,095 48 in gold, and $49 in greenbacks, being the result of collections in the various churches on Thanksgiving Day.

A man named Williams had his left hand blown to pieces, near Portland, a few days since, by the accidental discharge of a gun.

The recent storms inflicted severe damage to houses, bridges and fences throughout the State—a trifling matter, however, compared with the benefits the rains have conferred.

The Sacramento Bee says the charge that soldiers at Camp Union had not sufficient rations has been examined into by a board of officers and pronounced entirely without foundation.

A little boy aged three years, son of Fred Frasier, of Petaluma, was burned to death, a few days since. He had been playing with matches, from which his clothes ignited.

A difficulty occurred between R. Neale and Richard Brew, in a saloon in Grass Valley, on the 27th ult., in which Brew was killed. Neale was lodged in the county jail.

WET AND DRY.—What a great propensity people have for imbibing "something" in rainy weather! How can one account for the paradoxical fact that the wetter they get the drier they are? We dropped into Squarza's yesterday afternoon, and from the concourse we found practicing at his bar, concluded that Signor Squarza was a great benefactor in these wet times, and that the compounds of his laboratory were more sought after than India-rubber overcoats and umbrellas.

TO THE PUBLIC.—Go to the South Beach Bathing House, foot of Third street, near the Cannache, for comfort, pleasure or health ; where can be found at all hours warm, cold, or shower Salt Water Baths. The water is taken through pipes extending over five hundred feet in the bay, and as pure as can be drawn from the ocean. The public have only to give this place a trial to satisfy themselves that this is the best fitted up Bathing House in this city—the North Beach House having blown up.
N. B.—The boiler and machinery are entirely separate from the Bathing House.

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electro-pathic system ; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs ; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathize with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure. For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REDUCTION and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trifuration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or floor gold it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

As a guarantee of what this machine will do, I propose, with any gentleman who will produce an Amalgamator that will work the same amount of ore in the same number of hours, with the same outlay of power, and produce the equal result, to deposit the sum of FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS each, the money so deposited to be drawn by the person who shall be declared to have produced the best result. The money (the $500) by whichever party won to be paid over to some one of the benevolent institutions in this State, to be named by the party losing. This proposition is not made with the view of detracting from the merits of any Amalgamator now before the public, but for the purpose of placing this valuable improvement before such persons as may be interested in quartz milling, and to whom the matter properly belongs.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores ; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs. in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

SHADOWS.

WHEN the children are hushed in the nursery,
And the swallow sleeps in the caves,
And the night-wind is murmuring secrets
Apart to the listening leaves,
Then I open the inner chamber
That was closed from the dust of day,
And gently undraw the curtain
Where my holiest treasures lay.

Sweet spirits that may not slumber;
Cool shadows from lights now gone;
And the echo of voices sounding,
All sounding for me alone.
And, blending among the others,
One echo is softer yet;
One shadow is cooler, deeper;
And my dimming eyes grow wet.

For the image I gaze on longest,
Is the image that blessed my youth;
The angel that lit my journey
With her lamp of love and truth.
We travelled life's way together
A little while side by side;
And when I grew faint or weary,
That light was my strength and guide.

And dearer it grew—how dearer!
Till I watched it wane and fade;
And my angel said, as we parted,
Be patient, he not afraid.
And when I am sick and weary
With the heat and dust of the day,
How the sense of her words comes o'er me—
Her words ere she went away.

And I ask for a patient wisdom,
As I journey the way alone;
Till I tread on the golden threshold
Of the heaven where she is gone.
When the children are hushed in the nursery,
And the swallow sleeps in the caves,
And the night-wind is murmuring secrets
Apart to the listening leaves.

THE EXQUISITE AT COVER.

THE following jeu d'esprit we copy from an article which appeared in the New York Mirror, November 23, 1839, purporting to be extracted from a forthcoming work, called Harkaway; or, Brushes of Flood and Field. We do not know whether the work was ever issued, and therefore are unable to indicate either the author or publisher:

The impatient sportsmen, with palpitating hearts, surrounded the cover, holding tightened reins upon their ardent horses. All were watching for the glorious "break" with "Tally-ho!" ready to burst from every longing tongue. The horses, with pricked ears and glaring eye-balls, pawed the ground and champed their bits with anticipation of delight.

The personification of tailors', hatters', and perfumers' advertisements, Mr. Charles Olivier, seeing his friend Col. Scourfield within a few yards, cantered his graceful gallows towards him.

"Ah! my dear Colonel, how do you do?" inquired Mr. Olivier, checking his ambling nag. "I never saw this animal called a fox. By what means shall I be able to distinguish it?"

"By his brush," briefly responded the Colonel, with a smile.

"Brush! pray, what is a brush?"

"A tail, my dear fellow—a tail resembling your well-trimmed whiskers round a broom-handle."

"How very odd!"

"You cannot mistake him; but surely you have no intention of following the hunt in that gear?" said the Colonel, laughing.

"Gracious! No. The truth is, I was obliged to say last night that I had never seen a thing of the kind. It appeared Goth-like, and so I determined to venture this morning, and examine what is called, I believe, the throw off—but I've no intention of being thrown off. Dear me! No. I abominate danger in all shapes," replied Mr. Olivier, elegantly kissing his white glove to his friend, and cantering away. He had proceeded but a few yards, when he returned and said: "If I should see the animal, what shall I say, Colonel?"

"Not a word, if in cover."

"And if the creature comes out?"

"Hallo 'Tally-ho!' as loud as you can," replied the Colonel, turning his horse's head away from Mr. Olivier, leaving him alone to ponder upon his instructed duties.

The dress of Mr. Olivier had anything but the appearance of a fox-hunter's; a superfluous black coat and prunella pumps not being generally donned for the casualties of the dashing chase. His steed was slight-limbed, showy and high-spirited, but suited only to carry a lady—or Mr. Charles Olivier, who was unaccustomed to flying gates, or scrambles through prickly hedges.

The hounds continued to drive the fox from one corner of the cover to the other, without effecting the desired exit. Reynard had no inclination to quit his quarters, although his enemies were in such unenviable proximity. Every now and then he would come to the verge of the wood and take a survey; but, disliking the appearance of the surrounding pink coats, in he popped again, much to the annoyance of many who flattered themselves that now "break" he must, and the view-halloo ready to escape died into a grumble of suppressed disappointment.

Every hound now pressed close to the fox, and it was certain that out he must come or submit to the degrading fate of being "chopped"—killed upon his own hearth, without a meritorious struggle for life.

"Tilly-hoo-oo-oo, Tilly-hoo-oo-oo-oo!" to the astonishment of all, came evidently for a broad "Tallyho!" from some novice with the view halloo.

"For'ard, for'ard, for'ard!" shouted the huntsman, galloping towards the spot, with a few of the hounds, from whence the sound came.

"Come away, come away!" bawled the whipper-in, cracking his whip for the remainder to leave the cover and join the huntsman.

The horn winded a cheering "Hark-forward!"—horses reared and danced with delight. "Hold hard," everybody said: "let them get at it."

"Now for luck, and no checks," said one.

"He'll go for Sydenham earths," said another.

"Not he. The wind's wrong," suggested a third.

"A cool hundred that he makes for Ealing," a fourth offered to bet.

The huntsman arrived at the place where "tilly-hoo-oo" proceeded from, and there sat Mr. Charles Olivier, perseveringly chanting "tilly-hoo." An observation about "a post sometimes points out the road," undoubtedly came from the lips of the old huntsman as he saw the source from whence it came. Rising in his stirrups, he took off his cap and cheered the hounds to pick up the scent.

Wagging their tails, they snuffed the earth with distended nostrils, but no response was given; they ran to and fro, each endeavoring to "snatch the track, and lead the willing pack," but all to no purpose.

"Where did he break, sir?" inquired the huntsman, puzzled by the hounds being at fault.

"Gracious me! Close where you stand, the animal jumped out," replied Mr. Charles Olivier, with a confidential air.

Again the hounds were tried, but in vain. No scent could be found.

"Point out the exact spot, Olivier," said Colonel Scourfield.

"Gracious me! Why, there the creature is now!"

"Where—where—where?" was shouted in every direction.

Mr. Charles Olivier placed his glass quietly to his right eye, and, pointing to the topmost branch of a lofty elm, said:

"There it is—I knew him by his tail."

Who shall describe the horror, the astonishment and disgust of all, upon obeying the direction of a pointed finger, at seeing a squirrel, with his bushy tail curled over his head, peeping at the scene below with indubitable pleasure "at being above all danger."

Laughs, groans and hisses proceeded from every quarter. Mr. Charles Olivier began to suspect that he had committed some mistake; but, conceiving it politic to appear cool and collected under any accidents or awkwardness, he, with admirable sang froid, continued to look at the "animal," and occasionally observe that he recognized him by his tail.

"Flog him off!" "Duck him in a horse-pond!" "Go home!" "Get your nurse to come with you next time!" Such were the various little pleasant suggestions from the enraged sportsmen, at being subjected to the grievous disappointment occasioned by Mr. Charles Olivier's ignorance of natural history.

With fears, which were very excusable under the circumstances, the mistaken innocent felt that he was one too many. If in carving a goose the ill-shaped bird had glided into the lap of the fairest creature in the world, Mr. Charles Olivier could have imitated that refined personage who said, upon an occasion of the kind, "Madam, I'll trouble you for that goose." He could even have added, "Pray, don't apologize; such trifles will occur." However collected he would have been under such a trying ordeal, Mr. Olivier could not appear so comfortable under the present. "Flogging" and "horse-ponding" and "horse-pond" possessed so much of the nerve-agitating system, that, with chattering teeth, he looked beseechingly, and requested "to be heard."

"Hear him, hear him!" cried the majority, laughing.

"No, no! Duck him—duck him!" shouted others, among whom the huntsman's voice was the loudest.

As the reporters say, after a noisy squabble in the house, "order was restored," and Mr. Olivier thus commenced:

"Gentlemen, I certainly have mistaken an animal which I learn to be a squirrel for a fox. I asked my friend, Colonel Scourfield, how I should know the fox—that is, by what feature—and he said—"

"What did I say?" sharply interrupted his friend, disliking the appeal.

"By his tail, my dear Colonel, you certainly said," replied Mr. Olivier, with praiseworthy decision.

Bursts of laughter.

"As if a fox had a tail," said the old huntsman.

"I presume, by that observation, that the animal is without a tail. That is no fault of mine. I was informed by the Colonel that the creature had a brush. The Colonel also stated that I could not but know the animal, although I had no idea of the creature's form; for his brush or tail, which appear to be synonymous, bore a strong resemblance to one's whiskers round a broom-handle."

Rears of continued laughter.

"Now, gentlemen, you must admit a strong resemblance exists between that little creature's bushy tail, and my whiskers; both in shape and color," said Mr. Charles Olivier with a triumphant smile, pointing to the exalted squirrel.

After loud mirth for some minutes, it was unanimously decided that the speaker had satisfactorily justified himself. The sportsmen good-humoredly shook Mr. Olivier by the hand, rather too roughly, perhaps, for his delicate fingers, and some said with courtesy that they'd "back him against the parson for an argument."

"Try-back, try-back," hallooed the huntsman, and away the hounds went to pick up the lost scent. "Hark back, Musical—hark back, I tell ye!"—off galloped the old favorite leader to obey the mandate. In a few moments "tally-ho" rang from a corner of the cover, from which burst a splendid fox, closely followed by the crying Musical.

"For'ard, hark for'ard—hark to Musical!" shouted the huntsman; the horn was blown; the whipper-in hurried on with the tail hounds, and in an instant on rushed the pursuing and pursued—the many for sport, the one for life.

"Gracious me! Be quiet," said Mr. Charles Olivier to his courier, as the animal caught some of the enthusiasm of the sport. "I certainly—shall—not be able to hold him." Our hero was correct in this opinion; for his horse pulled upon his hands, unused to exertion, so violently that, after a few useless struggles, he followed his own inclination by galloping after the others, to the great discomfiture of his rider.

"What shall I do? what shall I do? He surely will not attempt to leap that wall!" exclaimed Charles Olivier, as they neared one of tolerable altitude. Still the resolute horse approached it with a determined manner. "I certainly shall be off!" said the rider, eliding to the pommel of the saddle with pertinacity. "I certainly shall." They were within a few strides of the wall, when the horse's ideas corresponded with his master's, that he should not attempt it; throwing himself suddenly upon his haunches, the careful animal succeeded in preventing any accident to himself by stopping on the right side of the barrier. This quick decision, however, did not hinder Mr. Charles Olivier from enjoying a leap; the impetus had the effect of sending him in a straight line over the horse's ears—clean over the wall, like the stick of a rocket, head-foremost into a duck-pond on the opposite side.

Crash, splash, went the luckless horseman—quack, quack, quack, screamed the ducks. "Gracious me!" bubbled from the lips of Mr. Charles Olivier, as he crawled from the water and the mire; "I—I—I never will see another fox-hunt as long as I breathe."

REGISTER YOUR MONEY LETTERS.—By new regulations of the Post Office Department no record by post-bills is now required to be made by Postmasters, except of unpaid or registered letters; therefore there is no way of tracing missing ones in other cases as formerly. The fee for registry is twenty cents, for which a receipt is returned by the Postmaster to the sender from the party receiving the money.—Sac. Union.

Not a bad story is going the rounds of Paris. A small German baron had occasion, as it seems, to see Baron Rothschild, of Frankfurt. The great financier was writing away for very life when Baron X. was announced. He did not even lift his eyes, but said, "Take a chair, sir." The Baron, with true German touchiness about titles, said, "Sir, indeed! I think M. le Baron did not hear my name. I am a baron also—the Baron X." "Ah, a thousand pardons!" said the banker, still writing; "you are a baron—take two chairs, then, if you will be so kind, and wait till I have finished this letter."

A BEWILDERED CLOD-POLE.—A short time since, we heard of a poor laborer in the Fens in Lincolnshire, whose brains were rather of the agricultural order, thickened still more, poor fellow! by the effects of his last illness, but to whom a zealous young clergyman most vigorously expounded his peculiar views on the subject of Justification and the absolute necessity there was for adopting them forthwith. The poor man, who had been hearing from other visitors of more secular but not less surprising things, at last looked his pastor in the face with lack-lustre eyes, and delivered himself of these words: "What with justification and what with railroads, it's all a buzzin' and a fuzzin', and I know nothing about it." This said, he fell back and died.

SOLD HIS COUNTRY FOR A WOMAN.—The Memphis Argus relates that there is now on trial at Morgantia, La., by court-martial, a young officer, attached as Adjutant to a New York regiment, charged with attempting to betray his men into ambuscade. It seems that the unfortunate man became enamored of a young lady, the daughter of a wealthy planter residing not far from the coast, and that, desiring to make her his wife, he proposed, and was accepted on condition that he would betray his command to a Confederate force to be conveniently ambushed. He accepted the proposition, and had got his men en route for the place of betrayal, when his design was discovered and he was placed under arrest.

A VIENNA ROMANCE.—It is going the rounds in the following dress: Love is a very uncertain thing, and it is not safe to be too certain of the symptoms until they are unmistakable. The following will explain our meaning, Vienna was stirred up lately by the comical result of a strange love story. It seems that in the house of one Herr Kuhne, a teacher of languages, Dr. Kant, a young lawyer, happened to make the acquaintance of a lady burdened with some property and thirty years. The lady being unmarried, evinced particular interest in the young, shy, and rather abashed man of law. She made love to him, in fact, very strongly and persuaded him to visit her at her house. But alas! he loved another lady. One evening, while conversing with the doctor she said: "With your favorable idea of matrimony, may I ask if you ever thought of marrying yourself?" Dr. Kant sighed, and his eye resting on the ground, hesitatingly muttered in reply: "I have already thought of marrying, and made my choice, but—" "But!" the lady hastily interposed. "But," he continued; "the lady is rich—very rich—and I am poor. I am afraid I could hardly aspire to her hand, and rather than allow myself to be taxed with sordid designs, I will bury my passion in my breast and leave it unavowed forever." At an early hour of the following day she, however, betook herself to a solicitor, and in legal form declared her wish to present and hand over as his sole property the sum of 150,000 guilders (£15,000) to Dr. Kant. When the document had been signed, countersigned and duly completed, she sat down in the office, and enclosing it in an elegant envelope, added a note to the following effect:

"DEAR SIR—I have much pleasure in enclosing a paper, which I hope will remove the obstacle in the way of your marriage. Believe me, etc., ALICE MARTINI."

Dr. Kant, for he and no other was the addressed, was the happiest man in the world on receiving this generous epistle. Repairing at once to the parents of Fraulein Fischel, the lady of his love, he proposed for and received the hand of a girl who had been flattered by his delicate though unavowed attentions. His reply to Alice Martini, beside conveying his sincerest thanks, contained two cartes de visite, linked together by the significant rose-colored ribbon. Miss Martini forthwith sued the happy bridegroom for restitution, but as no promise of marriage had been made, the case was, by two successive courts, decided against her.

REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

An excellent external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, &c.

DEATH'S DOINGS!

THE DEAD TELL NO TALES, 'TIS SAID. WHAT A pity 'tis 'tis true; for if they could, what a "skedaddling" there would be among the numerous quacks and impostors of the present time.

THE MEDICAL FACULTY

May differ in relation to the treatment of disease, but there is very little diversity of opinion among them as to its origin. The philanthropist does not contend that any man becomes at once a

DRUNKARD OR A THIEF.

Nor does the well informed physician maintain that any one becomes at once an invalid. He knows that almost all diseases are of slow growth; that the seeds of disease are often sown at a remote period, and only await some change of climate or condition of the individual to manifest themselves.

A COMMON COLD!

Is the forerunner of many a fatal disease; a leading symptom of Consumption; a general disturber of the human system, and

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

Is the greatest barrier that can be thrown in the way of its progress. Its timely use will ward off Consumption, cure the Asthma, Bronchitis, Sore Throat, and the thousand and one other ills sure to follow in its wake when too long neglected or improperly treated.

ALLEN'S

LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERNATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

Sold by all Druggists. Price $1 per bottle.

CATARRH!

DR. H. GOODALE'S

Catarrh Remedy!

FOR CENTURIES CATARRH HAS DEFIED THE skill of physicians and surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. Nothing save DR. GOODALE'S REMEDY will break it up, radically destroying the principle of the disease, and precluding the possibility of a relapse. Medical men have attempted to explain what it is, but admit that they have not discovered its antidote. Dr. Goodale offers this simple definition of its character: It is a disorder which he DOES CURE and they DO NOT. This is the great fact which it imports the sufferer to know, and a single trial will establish it beyond a question. Price, $1. Sold by all Druggists.

A DAY IN COURT.

[SCENE—Court-room. Great number of lawyers inside the bar, and spectators outside.]

ENTER JUDGE.

Judge—Mr. Sheriff, open Court.

Sheriff—Heary-ery-Disrig-Court-Judish'l-Disrig-snow-open, pursuant to adjournment!

Mr. Laven^s—Hem! If your honor please, I have a motion for a new trial not on the calendar, and I—

Judge—Sit down, sir! the Court has not dressed its hair.

Mr. Dwindle—If the Court please, in the interregnum between the hour of adjournment yesterday and the opening of Court this morning, I have examined assiduously the numerous authorities cited by your Honor yesterday, and have ascertained that the Supreme Court has overruled them all in the case of Trashbottom vs. Swinkle. I trust your Honor will reconsider—

Judge—Mr. Dwindle, when you address the Court you must employ more becoming language. The Court will not be told that it does not know the law. There is a certain propriety of language to be used by attorneys towards the judiciary that must never be departed from, and if it is the Court will—

Sheriff—Silence in Court!

Mr. Dwindle—I beg your Honor's pardon, but I thought your Honor might have overlooked the decision.

Judge—The Court never overlooks anything. We have an humble intellect, not gifted, perhaps, with the astuteness of some other gentlemen's, but in our humble way we endeavor to and generally succeed in ascertaining the true condition of the law on any controversy brought before our tribunal; and, as I said before, the Court will not be told that it does not understand the law.

Mr. Dwindle—But, your Honor—

Judge—Mr. Sheriff, commit Mr. Dwindle to the county jail for one week.

Mr. Dwindle—Your Honor is rather—

Judge—Mr. Dwindle will be fined five hundred dollars. Mr. Clerk, hand up the motion-calendar. [Clerk hands the calendar to the Judge.] The first case on the calendar is Bosh vs. Woodcalder. Demurrer to plaintiff's complaint. Parker for plaintiff. Defendant in person.

Mr. Woodcalder—Ready for defendant. If the Court please, yer Honor is convairant with the controversy in this action. The same issuo has been prasinted to yer Honor sixteen times, and yer Honor has decided it against the defendant every time. But I think I kin convince yer Honor that ye have been wrong.

Judge—Mr. Sheriff, arrest Mr. Woodcalder and commit him to solitary confinement until he makes an apology to the Court. We would here have the gentlemen of the bar understand distinctly that we are not to be trifled with. We have devoted a large portion of our life to the examination of law as a science, and feel tolerably convinced that we have mastered its intricacies and distinctions so fully as never to commit an error. It is in the highest degree improper and unbecoming for members of the bar to question our decision or to intimate that, after having arrived at a conclusion upon a legal proposition, we can or will alter our opinions. The Bar must be in entire subjection to the Bench. . . . Having disposed of Bosh vs. Woodcalder, the next case on the calendar is Dew vs. Swiggle. Bay for plaintiff. River for defendant. Motion for a new trial.

Mr. Bay—This case, your Honor, was tried at the last term, and the plaintiff was nonsuited. Our principal ground of motion is an abuse of discretion in the Court by—

Judge—Mr. Bay, we have stated to the bar once that the phrase "abuse of discretion" must never be applied to any of our rulings. It exceeds the legitimate bounds of the attorney's sphere to characterize any of our opinions as an abuse of discretion. It must not be repeated, sir, and if—

Mr. Bay—But, your Honor, that expression has—

Judge—The Court is speaking, now, sir; it must not be interrupted. I say that although the phrase "abuse of discretion" has been employed for several centuries as expressive of the too extensive exercise of the judgment of the Court in matters of doubt, it is a barbarous relic of a barbarous age, and one unsuited to the enlightened discrimination which now adorns the bench of this Court. The expression must not be repeated. We take occasion to repeat it to the bar. Go on, sir!

Mr. Bay—Well, if your Honor please, with the profoundest deference to the enlightened discrimination which now adorns the bench of this Court, I propose to point to your Honor the particular topic upon which, it seems to me, the Court exercised a too extensive judgment in a matter of doubt.

Judge—It will not be necessary, Mr. Bay, to make an argument upon the question—the Court is perfectly familiar with the matter, and no additional light can be thrown upon it.

Mr. Bay—But your—

Judge—Mr. Sheriff, adjourn the Court.

Sheriff—Hery-ery! the Dist-Court nowstans-adjourned till morromorn'g at ten-o'clock.

DRAMATIC FEUILLETON.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, December 10, 1864.

THE Metropolitan Theatre reminds me of a musket, one of the old-fashioned flint-lock affairs, which you may new-stock and burnish up as often as you like, and load with the best of powder, only to obtain the same miserable flash-in-the-pan, or else a blundering explosion and a kick and recoil, never by any chance making a hit, but inevitably flooring the man who holds the gun.

Why this should be I cannot determine, for it is a large and excellently-arranged house, the ventilation is good, the location is convenient, and there is no reason, apparently, why it should not draw as well as any place of amusement in town. But it does not. If opened one week by some confident manager, it is fair to bet that it will be closed the next. My own private belief is that some rival manager has set the story afloat that the auditorium is haunted, this being the reason why people so persistently refuse to go there.

When The Siege of Troy was brought out I thought the house had got down to its last legs. But I was not prepared for so speedy and complete a collapse as has taken place. After the actors had compromised their health and their reputations in that piece, they certainly had a right to expect that salaries would be paid them, if nothing more—but no; they tell me that the manager, Hoffman, is an Off man, and that he has gone no man knoweth whither, owing much and paying nothing. So that for the piece announced as being in rehearsal, Paradise Lost, we have the sudden substitution, so far as the actors are concerned, of Salaries Lost. Who will undertake the Metropolitan next?

They have been doing it Brown at Maguire's Opera House during the week, The Invisible Prince having taken the place of Pocahontas. This latter piece had an excellent run, rather a singular fact to me when I remember how signally real Indians, (the Winnemucca troupe,) failed in their attempt to captivate the public a few days before. I'm afraid that poor Winnemucca went home to his sage-brush with the impression that scalping paid much better than keeping a show, and that travellers overland from this city may be made to regret that they had not patronized his entertainment.

Why the piece now on the Opera House stage is called The Invisible Prince I do not understand, for certainly more of the Prince is visible than is generally seen on the stage. To have called it "The Invisible Pants" would have better expressed the idea which the costume conveys. When the Prince came tripping on, the other evening, with "Here friends, I make my bow," I certainly expected to hear some reprobate in the pit remark that it was certainly a bough without a single leaf; but nothing was said, and the play went on. Miss Brown is becoming quite a favorite; the more that people see of her the more they seem to like her, and, adopting this fact as a basis to start upon, there is no telling how great a favorite she may not become if she perseveres in showing her good points.

The theatrical event of the week was the début of Miss Louise Deaderick at Maguire's, on Monday evening. It was the first appearance of the lady "upon any stage"—if we perhaps except those four-horse affairs which carry people from one place to another—and it was the most, if not the only, successful début I have witnessed during my residence in California—a blissful period, dating back nearly two years. In the first place, the débutante had youth and good looks in her favor—two chances to which it is generally safe for a lady to trust for success in anything, even without talent to back them. In this case, however, the lady displayed a rare talent, an uncommon talent, though known to the multitude as "common sense." The piece was The Little Treasure, Miss Deaderick, of course, taking the part of "Gertrude." With a judgment rarely seen in beginners, and quite as seldom exhibited, I am sorry to say, by habitués of the stage, she contented herself with being the character instead of endeavoring to act it, illustrating a favorite idea of mine in that respect. Can any one tell me why actors are not always content with being natural, with looking and doing on the stage somewhat as they would in private life? It is positively refreshing to occasionally see a person before the footlights with whom one can sympathize, and in whom we can recognize a man or woman instead of that stilted, impossible animal commonly called actor. Apropos of this idea, and in connection with this début, the Atta had a criticism so nearly interpreting my views that were there space I would reproduce it here, inasmuch as I have not time to write so fully upon this subject myself as I would wish to.

Miss Deaderick was "Gertrude" all the piece through; she looked as pretty as a pink, or as two pinks, in fact, and had the sympathy of the audience with her from the first. This sympathy manifested itself in a perfect shower of bouquets, in two calls before the curtain, and in an excellent house on the second evening of her appearance, notwithstanding a pouring rain. Miss Deaderick made her début as the "Little Treasure"; if she be faithful to herself and the vocation she has chosen, she will soon become known to the stage as a "Great Treasure"—a treasure which no one will be eager to see laid up in heaven. On Monday evening next she appears as "Annie," in The Toddlekin.

I would much like to pay to the excellent acting of Mrs. Saunders and Mr. Mayo, in The Little Treasure, that tribute of praise which they deserve, but space fails me. Mrs. Saunders I consider one of the best and most versatile actresses on the stage.

At the Eureka Mr. P. B. Isaacs, for many years connected with Wood's and Bryants' Minstrels, and author of several popular songs, makes his appearance on Monday evening. For knowledge of what else is going on in the only places of amusement in town worth patronizing, turn to the advertising columns and spare the trouble of recapitulation to

THE FALCON.

IN doors on a summer-day like this,
I pine with a fancied wrong;
But out in the sunshine, out in the wind
My soul is a falcon strong.

The brave, bright sun so merry and old,
He lends his strength to my wings,
And I soar till I see the golden gate
Where the lark at morning sings.

But let my lady summon me back,
I come as a falcon should,
Out of the sunshine, out of the wind,
And yield my eyes to the hood.—[Stoddard.

CHAPTER IV.

TREDETHLYN'S LUCK.

FRANCIS-TREDETHLYN had to wait a very long time before there could be any possibility of a letter from the Gray's Inn solicitors, but he endured the delay with perfect tranquillity of mind, and if either of the two men seemed anxious for the arrival of the letter, that man was Harcourt Lowther, and not Francis Tredethlyn. The ensign had a trick of alluding to his servant's good fortune whenever things went especially ill with himself.

"Here am I without a friend in the world to lend me a five-pound note," he would remark, impatiently, "and there are you with the chance of a nice little legacy from that old uncle of yours. I shouldn't wonder if you stand in for four or five hundred at the least."

"I don't think it, sir," the valet always answered, coolly. "I've heard our neighbors say, that what with farming, what with mining, and dabbling a good bit with funds and railway shares, and such like, my uncle must be as rich as a Jew; but for all that, I don't look to be much better off for anything that he'll have left me. I suppose he's left everything to my cousin Susan, seeing that he had neither kith nor kin except her and me. But somehow or other I can't imagine his parting with his money to any one, even after his death. I almost fancy that he'd rather have tied it up, if he could, so that the interest upon it would go on accumulating for ever and ever, thinking, as he might, perhaps, being old and eccentric, that he'd have a kind of satisfaction, even in his grave, from knowing that the money was going on getting more and more, instead of being spent or squandered."

Francis Tredethlyn did not make this remark in any spirit of ill-nature; he spoke like a man who states a plain fact.

"I dare say he was a regular old curmudgeon," Mr. Lowther answered, "but he must leave his money to some one, and the fact of these lawyers advertising for you is ample proof that he must have left some of it to you."

Such a conversation as this occurred pretty frequently during the long interval in which Francis Tredethlyn waited for the answer to his letter. Sometimes, when Harcourt Lowther was in a very bad temper, he would accuse his attendant of having grown proud, and insolent, and lazy, since the advent of that Times newspaper, which the ensign had borrowed from Mr. Corbett; but every one of the accusations was as groundless as many other of the officer's complaints against people and things in general. There was no change in Francis Tredethlyn: he did his work cheerfully and well, obeyed orders in a frank, manly spirit, and behaved himself altogether in a most exemplary manner.

The time when a letter from England might be expected came round at last; but Francis Tredethlyn evinced no anxiety for the arrival of the solicitors' epistle. A long season of drought had given way before a sudden downfall of rain, and Harcourt Lowther, who had planned a couple of days' kangaroo hunting, and had made all necessary arrangements for the performance of his duties by a good-natured and efficient color-sergeant, found himself a prisoner in his cottage at Port Arthur, with nothing to do but wait for a change in the weather.

It was very tiresome. The accomplished, light-hearted Harcourt Lowther, who could take life so pleasantly in the drawing-rooms of Tyburnia or Belgravia, to whom a summer afternoon amongst a group of fashionable gossips in the smoking-room of his favorite club was only too short, found this terrible Tasmanian day intolerably long. He had tried every available way of getting rid of his time. He had sketched a little, and read a little, and played the flute a little, and smoked a great deal, and had relieved the oppression of his spirits by an incalculable number of yawns, and a little occasional bad language. And now, having exhausted all these resources, he stood with his head leaning listlessly against the roughly finished sash of the window, watching the convict laborers at work under the heavy rain. He derived some faint ray of comfort from the sight of these two men. At any rate, there were some people in the world worse off than himself—unlucky wretches who were obliged to work in wet weather, and wear a hideous dress, and eat coarse, unpalatable food, or food that appeared abominably coarse and unpalatable in the eyes of Mr. Harcourt Lowther, who had been known, upon occasions, to turn up his nose at the culinary masterpieces of Soyer and Francatelli.

"Why don't they kill themselves?" muttered the ensign; "they could drive rusty nails into their veins, and make an end of themselves somehow. There are plenty of poisonous things in my garden that they might eat, and make a finish of their lives that way; but they don't. They go on day after day, drudging and toiling, and enduring their lives somehow or other. I suppose they hope to get away some day. How ever should I bear my life if I didn't hope to get away—if I didn't hope it would come to an end pretty soon?"

Mr. Lowther, having exhausted the pleasure to be derived from a contemplation of the convicts, took to pacing up and down the two rooms; in the inner of which Francis Tredethlyn was busy cleaning his master's guns.

Walking backwards and forwards, and backwards and forwards, and passing the valet every time, Harcourt Lowther was fain to talk to him; rather for the pleasure and relief of hearing his own voice, than from any desire to be friendly towards his vassal.

"No letter yet, Tredethlyn?" he said.

"No, sir; but it may come any day."

"And you wait for it as quietly as if a legacy, more or less, was nothing to you. I suppose if they send you a remittance you'll be wanting to buy your discharge, and leave this place, and I shall have to get another servant—some awkward, ignorant boor, perhaps?"

"I don't know that, sir. There's plenty as good as me, I dare say, among our fellows. Other folks may have been brought up respectably, and taken to soldiering, like me. And as for buying my discharge, I don't say but I should be glad to do that, if those lawyer people gave me the chance. I should be glad to get back to England and see my little cousin Susy. I always call her little Susy, because I can't help thinking of her as she was when I remember her first, when she and I were boy and girl sweethearts together. I have thought of her a deal since I got the news of her father's death, and I feel anxious about her, somehow or other, when I fancy her left alone among strangers."

Harcourt Lowther, always walking backwards and forwards between the two rooms, was in the sitting-room when his servant said this. He stopped to look out of the window again, and there seemed to be a kind of dismal fascination for him in the convicts, towards whom his eyes wandered in a moody, absent-minded stare.

"And where do you expect to find her—your cousin, I mean—when you do go back to England?" he asked, presently.

"At the old farm, sir, to be sure. Where should I find her but there? Poor little soul! she's never known any other home but that, and isn't likely to leave it in a hurry, of her own free will."

"Humph!" muttered the officer, "there's no calculating upon the changes that take place in this world. I never expect to find anything as I left it when I return to a place or people that I've been absent from for any length of time. I expect to find plenty of changes when I get back to the civilized world again. Do you suppose the people there can afford to waste their time thinking of wretched exiles here? Life with them is utterly different from what it is with us. When I left England I was engaged to a beautiful girl with fifty thousand pounds or so for her fortune—a girl who would have married me, and given me a grand start in life, if it hadn't been for her father; but do you think I expect to find her in the same mind when I go back? Do you think two years' absence won't act as a spouse, and wipe my image out of her thoughts? What has a beautiful, frivolous creature like that to do with constancy? Every man who looks at her falls over head and ears in love with her. She is fed upon flattery and adulation. Is it probable, or natural, or even even possible that she will remember me?"

It was not likely that Mr. Lowther would ask this question of his valet. He asked it of himself, rather, in a peevish and complaining spirit, and seemed to find a dismal comfort in harping on his wrongs and miseries.

"I was a fool to think that Maude Hillary could be constant to me," he muttered, angrily. In his anger against a world that had treated him so badly, he was angry with himself for having been so much a fool as to expect better treatment. He walked to a little looking-glass hanging over the mantel-piece, and looked at his handsome face. Was it the face of a man who was to have no place in the world? Were his many graces of person, his charm of manner, his versatility of mind, to serve for nothing, after all?

"When I think of the fellows who get on in the world, I feel inclined to make an end of all this by cutting my throat," he said, as he frowned at the image in the glass.

He felt the region of the jugular vein softly with the ends of his fingers as he spoke, and wondered whether death by the severance of that important artery was a very painful finish for a man to make. He thought of how he might look if Francis Tredethlyn, finding him late to rise one morning, broke into his room and saw him lying in the sunny little chamber, deluged with blood, and stone dead. He had been very religiously brought up, amongst gentle, true-hearted women; but there was no more pious compunction in his mind, as he thought of suicide, than there might have been in the mind of an aboriginal inhabitant of the Solomon Islands. He had a mother at home—a mother who believed in him, and idolized him, to the disparagement of all other creatures; but no image of her grief and despair arose between him and the scheme of a desperate death. His thoughts travelled in a narrow circle, of which self was the unchanging centre.

"I have heard of men making away with themselves on the very eve of some event which would have made a complete change in their fortunes," he thought, presently. "I never read the story of a suicide that did not seem more or less the story of a fool. No, my death shall never make a paragraph for a newspaper. I must be very hard pushed when I come to that. This place gives me the blue devils, and everything looks black to me out here. I wish Abel Jansz Tasman and Captain Cook had perished before ever they sighted this dismal land. I wish all the lot of petty Dutch traders and navigators had come to an untimely end before ever they discovered any one of these miserable islands, which have been a paradise for convicts and scoundrels, and a hell for gentlemen during the last half-century. How was I to know, when I bought a commission in her Majesty's service, that the first stage on the road to martial glory was to be the post of head-jailor at a settlement in the antipodes? The papers talk of a change in the transportation system—a change that will rid Van Diemen's Land of its present delightful inhabitants; but no change is likely to come about in any time. I shall have to drag my chain out to the last link, I dare say. It's better to be born lucky than rich, says the proverb; but how about the poor devils who are neither rich nor lucky?"

A rap on the little door that opened out of the sitting-room on to a patch of garden which lay between the house and the high road, startled Mr. Lowther out of his long reverie.

"It's the fellow with the letters," he cried; and before Francis Tredethlyn could emerge from the inner room, his master had opened the door, and had taken a little packet of letters, newspapers and magazines from the man who brought them. "One from my mother; one from—yes—from Maude, at last: the Times, Punch, Blackwood, United Service, and the lawyer's letter!—Francis Tredethlyn, Esq.! eh? The legacy must be something more than five hundred, my man, or they'd hardly dub you Esquire."

He tossed the letter over to his servant as he spoke, and looked at the Cornishman furtively, with something like envy expressed in his look. Francis Tredethlyn received the lawyer's epistle very coolly, and retired into the adjoining room to read it, while his master sat at the table in the parlor, tearing off the flimsy envelope of a letter with a hasty nervous hand.

"From Maude!" he muttered. "At last, my lady; at last, at last!"

The letter was a very long one, written in a clear and bold, yet sufficiently feminine hand, on slippery pink paper, scented with a perfume that had survived an Australian voyage. The contents of the letter must have been tolerably pleasing to Harcourt Lowther, for he smiled as he read, and seemed to forget all about Francis Tredethlyn's legacy.

"I miss you very much, though papa surrounds us with gaiety—indeed, I think we have been gayer than ever lately, and he never seems so happy as when our dear old lawn is crowded by visitors. But I miss you, Harcourt, in spite of all the cruel insinuations in your last letter. The summer evenings seem long and dreary when I think of you, so far away, so unhappy, as your letters tell me you are, Harcourt, though you are too unselfish to admit the truth in plain words. I scarcely open the piano once in a month now that I have no one to play concertante duets. I scarcely care for a new opera, for the men who come into our box bore me to death with their rapid talk, and I know that not one of them understands what he talks about. I am not happy, Harcourt, though you taunt me with my wealth, and my position, and the difference between our lives. I am not happy, for our future seems to grow darker and darker every day. I have mentioned to my father several times, and every time he seems more angry than the last; so now I feel that your name is tacitly tabooed, and any chance allusion to you from the lips of strangers makes me tremble and turn cold. I have tried in vain to comprehend the reason of my father's aversion to any thought of a marriage between you and me. I have been so much a spoiled child, that to be thwarted or opposed on any subject seems strange to me, most of all when that subject is so near my heart. I can scarcely think that my dear father would allow any consideration of fortune to stand in the way of my happiness, and yet that is the only consideration that can influence him, for I know that he always liked and admired you. You must awhile be patient: what I can do I will. And you must trust me, dear Harcourt, and not pain me again as you have pained me by those unkind doubts of my constancy. You know that money has never been any consideration with me; and you ought to know that I would willingly lose every penny of my fortune rather than sacrifice my promise to you."

"Oh, yes, that's all very well!" muttered Mr. Lowther, peevishly, after having read this part of Miss Hillary's epistle twice over; but Lionel Hillary's daughter with fifty thousand pounds or so, and without a penny, are two very different people. Not but what she's always a beautiful girl, and a charming girl; but a man can have his pick of charming and beautiful girls, if that's all he wants to set him up in life. I love her, Heaven knows; and the sight of her writing sends a thrill through my veins like the touch of her hand, or the fluttering of her breath upon my cheek. But poverty makes a man practical, and I think I never read a letter that had less of the practical in it than this letter. It's a woman's epistle all over. We must be patient, and wait till we're worn out by waiting, and the engagement between us becomes a chain that binds us both from better things, and the sound of each other's name becomes a nuisance to us from its associations of trouble and responsibility. That's what a long engagement generally comes to. If I'd distinguished myself in India, led a desperate charge against orders, or taken the gate of an Afghan fortress, or done something reckless and mad-headed and lucky, and could have gone back with a captaincy, and a dash of newspaper celebrity about my name, I might have hoped that old Hillary, in a moment of maudlin after-dinner generosity, would have given his consent to my marriage with Maude; but how am I to present myself at Twickenham, and say, 'I have been taking care of convicts for the last two years, not particularly well, for more convicts have escaped into the bush in my time than in any other man's time, according to the reports; and I have come back to England with the same rank that I had when I left, and with less money than I took away with me?' Can I go to Lionel Hillary and say that? Is that the sort of argument which will induce a man to give me his daughter and her fortune?"

He went back to Miss Hillary's letter. It was only a frivolous letter, after all; and it contained more intelligence about a morning concert in Hanover Square, a regatta at Ryde, and a preternaturally sagacious Skye terrier, than was likely to be gratifying to a discontented exile at Port Arthur. But Mr. Lowther was fain to content himself as he might with the pretty girlish gossip. It was something, after all his grumbling, to receive the assurance that he was not entirely forgotten by the only daughter and sole heiress of one of the richest merchants in the city of London.

He looked up presently from his letter, to see Francis Tredethlyn standing in the doorway between the two rooms, pale to the lips, and clutching at his throat as if he had some difficulty in breathing.

"What's the matter, man?" asked the ensign; hasn't the old chap left you any money, after all?"

"It isn't that, sir," gasped the soldier; "there's money enough, and to spare. It's my cousin Susy, that poor little innocent creature, that was as pure as the apple blossoms on the guarded old trees in the orchard when I left home. She's done something, sir, something that turned her father against her. She's gone away, sir, and no one knows where she's gone, or what's come of her, whether she's dead or alive. And her father disinherited her, poor lost lamb; and—and that'll tell you all about the fortune, sir, if you want to know about it." Francis Tredethlyn threw the lawyer's letter upon the table before his master, and walked away to the window, at which the ensign had stood looking out at the convicts half an hour before.

Harcourt Lowther read the lawyer's letter, at first with a listless, indifferent air, and then as eagerly as if he had been reading his own death-warrant. It was a long letter, worded in a very formal manner, but it set forth the fact that the fortune left by Oliver Tredethlyn to his nephew Francis amounted to something over thirty thousand a year.

For some minutes after this fact had been made clear to him Harcourt Lowther sat with the open letter before him, staring at the lines. Then suddenly the blank stupor upon his face gave way to a look of despair. The ensign flung his head and arms upon the table, and burst into tears.

"I have been eating my own heart in this place for nearly two years," he sobbed, "and not one ray of light—no, by the heaven above me! not one—has dawned upon my life; and a valet, a private soldier, the fellow who scours my rooms and blacks my boots has thirty thousand a year left him."

There was something so terrible in this hysterical outburst of rage and envy, something so utterly piteous in this unmanly revolt against another man's good fortune, that Francis Tredethlyn forgot his own trouble before the aspect of his master's degradation!

"Don't, sir," he cried, "for God's sake, don't do that. All the riches in the world wouldn't pay a man for taking on like that. If you want money, you're welcome to borrow some of mine as soon as ever I get the power to lend it. There's more than I care to have, or could ever spend. You'll be welcome to what you want, Mr. Lowther. I don't set much account upon money, and I don't think I ever shall; and the thoughts of this fortune don't give me half the pleasure I've felt in the gift of a crown piece long ago, when I was a little lad. I suppose it was because I thought then there was nothing in all the world that five shillings wouldn't buy, and because I'm wiser now, and know there are some things a million of money can't purchase. The news of this money has brought the thoughts of my father and mother back to me, Mr. Lowther. I'd give every sixpence of it if it could bring back the past, and pay out the bailiff's man that was sitting by our kitchen fire at home when my mother lay ill up-stairs. But it can't do that. My father and mother both died poor, and all this money can't buy back one of the sorrowful days they spent in the old farm, when things went from bad to worse, and debt and ruin came down upon us. I don't seem to care for the money, Mr. Lowther; I am dazed and bewildered, somehow, by the greatness of the sum, but I don't seem to care."

The ensign had calmed himself by this time. He got up and brushed the tears from his eyes—real tears of rage, envy, mortification, and despair. There was a faint blush upon his face, the one evidence of his shame which he could not suppress in a moment, but all other evidences of feeling had passed away.

"You're a good fellow; as simple-hearted as a baby—for who but a baby ever talked as you talk about this money?—and I congratulate you upon your good luck. I see these lawyer fellows send you a bill for a couple of hundred; that'll buy you off here pleasantly, and get you back to England. My advice to you is to get back as fast as ever you can, and enter into the possession of your property. It seems a complicated kind of estate from what I can make out—mining property, and agricultural property, and shares in half the speculations of modern times—but it's a great estate, and that's all you want to know. Go back, and as soon as ever I can get away from this accursed hole I'll look you up in London; and I—I will borrow a little of that money you generously offer, and I'll turn bear leader, and show you what life is in the upper circle, to which thirty thousand a year is the universal 'open sesame.'"

The ensign slapped his hand upon his servant's shoulder with a jovial air, and spoke almost as gaily as if Oliver Tredethlyn's fortune was to be in some way or other a stroke of good luck for himself.

"Thank you, sir," Francis answered, thoughtfully, "you're very good; but I don't care to force myself in among grand folks because I'm rich enough to do as they do. I've got a task before me, and it may be a long one."

"A task?"

"Yes; I've got to look for my cousin."

"Your cousin, Susan Tredethlyn?—the girl whose portrait you showed me?"

"Yes, sir. All this money would have been hers, most likely, if she hadn't done something to turn my uncle against her. I can't forget that, you see, sir, and the first use I make of the money will be to spend some of it in looking after her."

"Susan Tredethlyn," muttered Harcourt Lowther, "Susan Tredethlyn. That portrait you showed me was a very bad one, for I haven't the least notion of what your cousin is like."

CHAPTER V.

COMING HOME.

WHEN the jaded horses of the "Electric" coach from Falmouth stopped before the "Crown Inn," at Landresdale, in the county of Cornwall, on the 13th of July, 1852, the landlord of the little hostelry was somewhat startled by an event which was of very rare occurrence in those parts. A passenger alighted from the back of the coach, and demanded his portmanteau from the guard—a passenger who, carrying this portmanteau as easily as if it had been a parcel of flimsy milliner's ware, walked straight to the little private parlor opposite the bar, and ensconced himself therein.

"I shall want my dinner and a bed," Joseph Penruffin, he said to the proprietor of the "Crown." "You'd better see the coach off, and then you can come and talk to me."

Mr. Penruffin retired, aghast and staring.

"I don't know who he is, Sarah," he remarked to a comely-looking woman, who was sitting amongst a noble array of shelves and bottles in a shady little bar that seemed a good deal too small for such a portly presence. "His name's as clean gone out of my mind as if I'd never set eyes upon him; but I know him, and he knows me, Sarah, for he called me by my name as glib as you please, and his face—Lord bless us and save us!—his face is familiar to me as yourn."

The passenger who had surprised the "Crown Inn" from its lazy tranquillity stood at the little window, looking out at the coach. The passenger was Francis Tredethlyn, lately a foot soldier in her Majesty's service, now a gentleman of landed estate and funded property; but very little changed by the change in his fortune. As he had been independent and fearless in the days when he ruled his life by the orders of other men, so was he simple and unpretending now in the hour of his sudden prosperity. What he had said to his master in the cottage at Port Arthur in the first flush of his new fortunes appeared to be equally true of him now. He did not seem to care about his wealth. He was in no way elated by a change of fortune which would have sent some men into a madhouse.

"It seems to me, somehow, as if there was a kind of balance kept up in this world between good and evil, like the debtor and creditor sides of a ledger. I put down my uncle Oliver's fortune on one side, and it looks as if I was the luckiest fellow in Christendom. But there's the loss of poor little Susy must go down on the other side, and then the book looks altogether different. The loss of her—yes, the loss—that's the word! If the earth had opened and swallowed her up, she couldn't seem more lost to me than she is."

The passengers of the "Electric" had refreshed themselves by this time, and a fresh pair of horses had replaced the tired animals who now stood steaming in the great stable yard. The coach rolled slowly off along a road that lay straight before the windows of the "Crown," a road that crept under the steep slope of a thickly-wooded hill, defended by an old crumbling wall, which, even in its decay, was grander and stronger than any modern wall that ever girdled a modern gentleman's estate. The dark red brick wall, and all the sombre woods above it, belonged to the Marquis of Landresdale, upon whose mansion and estate the little town or village of Landresdale was a kind of dependent, the inhabitants being almost all of them supported indirectly or directly by the patronage of the great man and his household. By these simple people the Cornish nobleman was spoken of with awe and reverence as the "Marquis;" and that the world held any other creature with a claim to that title was a fact utterly ignored—it may be, even discredited—by the ratepayers of Landresdale. Under the shadow of Landresdale House they were born and lived; and in a church which was only a kind of mausoleum for the departed nobles and dames of the house of Landresdale they worshipped every sabbath day, until, in the minds of some hero-worshippers, the figure of the Marquis grew into a giant shape that blotted out all the world beyond Landresdale.

"How familiar the old place seems to me, and yet how strange!" thought Francis Tredethlyn, as he stood at the window. "There's Jim Teascott, the cobbler over the way, sitting in the very same attitude he was in when I stopped at the corner below to take my last look at Landresdale. But the street seems as if it had dwindled and shrunk away into half the size it used to be; and I feel as strange—as strange as if I'd been dead and buried, and had come to life again after folks had forgotten all about me: even the very seasons are all wrong, somehow, to my mind, as they might seem to a man that had been lying dead ever so long."

Francis Tredethlyn rubbed his broad palm across his forehead, as if to clear some kind of cloud away from his intellect. It was scarcely strange that he should be confused and mystified by the seasons. He had left autumnal clouds and winds in the antipodes, and after a hundred days or so at sea, he found a blazing July sky above his native land, and he felt as if he had, somehow or other, been cheated out of a winter. He looked at a little pocket-book, in which he had written some names and addresses, and other memoranda, and in which the initials "S. T." occurred very often. Those initials meant Susan Tredethlyn, and the memoranda in the pocket-book chiefly related to inquiries which Francis had made about his lost cousin.

Those inquiries had resulted in very little information. The lawyers had only been able to tell Francis the bare facts relating to his uncle's death; how one day, when they least expected to see the old man, he had suddenly presented himself at their offices, very pale, very feeble, and with an awful something, which even they recognized as the sign-manual of the King of Terrors himself, imprinted on his haggard features; how he had seated himself quietly in his accustomed place, and had dictated to them, deliberately and unflinchingly, the terms of a will, by which he bequeathed every shilling he possessed to his nephew, Francis Tredethlyn; how, when they, as in duty bound, remonstrated with him about the injustice that such a will would inflict upon his only daughter, a hideous frown had distorted his face, and he had struck his clenched fist upon the office table, crying, with the most horrible imprecation ever uttered in that place, that no penny to his getting should ever go to save his daughter from rotting in a workhouse or starving to death on the king's highway; he had said this, and in such a manner as to most effectually put an end to all remonstrance on the part of his solicitors. This was all that the lawyers could tell Francis Tredethlyn about his cousin Susan; but they had gone on to tell him how his uncle had insisted on leaving the office alone, and on foot; how he had walked the best part of the way from Gray's Inn to an old-fashioned commercial inn in the Borough, and how he had broken down at last, only a hundred yards from his destination, and had fainted away on the threshold of a chemist's shop, whence he had been carried to his death-bed.

This had happened on the 20th of June in the preceding year; and this was all the lawyers had to tell Francis Tredethlyn, over and above such intelligence as related only to the extent and nature of the property bequeathed to him by his late uncle.

But in Landresdale the name of Oliver Tredethlyn was almost as well known as that of the Marquis himself; and in Landresdale Francis hoped to learn the true story of his cousin's fate. He stood now looking out of the window into the rustic highway, as quiet in the summer evening calm as if it had been a street in one of the buried cities of Italy, as peaceful in its drowsy aspect as if no palpitating human heart had ever carried its daily burden of care and sorrow along the narrow footways, beneath the shadow of the peaked roofs and quaint abutting upper stories. He stood looking out, and remembering himself a boy in that old hillside street; he stood there now, wondering alike at the past and the present, which by contrast seemed both equally strange and unnatural; he stood there in all the flush and vigor of his youth, a tall, broad-shouldered, simple-hearted soldier, with a fortune far exceeding the narrow limits of his arithmetical powers, as ignorant of all the real world that lay before him as a little country lad who rides to town upon the top of a load of hay expects to find the streets paved with gold, and the Queen dressed in her crown and robes, and sitting on her throne with the boll and sceptre in her hands for ever and ever.

The landlord of the Crown came bustling in presently with a wooden tray of knives and forks and glasses and crusts that would have amply served for a dinner party of half a dozen. He laid the cloth with great ceremony, although with a certain air of briskness inseparable from inn-keeping, even in the laziest and dullest village in all England; and he kept a furtive watch upon his guest throughout all his operations, from the preparatory polishing down of the mahogany table to the final flourish with which he removed a very large cover from a very small rumpsteak.

"I think I ought to know you, sir," he said courteously, as Francis Tredethlyn seated himself at the table.

"I think you ought, Joseph Penruffin; I think you ought to remember Francis Tredethlyn, son of your old friend John Tredethlyn, of Pen Gorbald, who was a little bit too friendly in this house, perhaps, for his own prosperity."

"Francis Tredethlyn!" cried the landlord, clapping his hand upon his knee: "Francis Tredethlyn! To be sure it is! To think that I should forget a face that was once as familiar to me as my own sons'! Francis Tredethlyn! Why, I remember you a lad playing cricket on the green yonder with my own boys. And you've come into a very fine fortune, sir, I understand; and I hope you will excuse the liberty, if I make so bold as to wish you every happiness with it, Francis Tredethlyn. Lord bless us and save us! why, I can remember you a little bit of a toddling child coming into Landresdale church with your mother on a summer Sunday morning, as if it was yesterday! I ask pardon for being so bold and free-like, but the sight of your face takes me back to old times, and I'm apt to forget myself."

Mr. Penruffin's mind was curiously divided between the memories of the past and his desire to be duly reverential to Francis Tredethlyn's new fortunes. The young man smiled as he recognized the influence of his newly-acquired wealth: at war with the associations of his boyhood. He had seen pretty much the same thing in the office of Messrs. Krusdale & Scardon. He was beginning already to perceive that an income of thirty thousand a year made a kind of barrier between himself and poorer men, and that they regarded him with the same feeling of mingled reverence and familiarity with which they would have looked at a very ordinary statue seen across a wonderful screen of virgin gold.

"And the sight of your face takes me back to old times, Mr. Penruffin," he said, with rather a mournful accent, "and I'd freely give half this great fortune of mine if I could bring back one of those summer Sunday mornings in the old church and see myself a little fellow again, trudging by my mother's side, with a green-baize bag of prayer-books on my arm. I'd give five thousand pounds for a silk dress I saw in a Plymouth draper's fifteen years ago, when I was too poor to do anything but wish for it, if my mother were alive to wear it. I used to think, when I was a lad, of what I'd buy for my mother out of the first five-pound note I ever earned, and now I've got thirty thousand a year, and there's nothing upon all this earth that I can buy for her except a gravestone to mark the spot where she lies."

"Thirty thousand a year!" muttered the landlord in an undertone, which had just a tinge of disappointment in it. The Landresdale people had given their imaginations free play since the death of Oliver Tredethlyn, and the old man's fortune had swelled into almost fabulous proportions with the lapse of time; so thirty thousand didn't seem so very much, after all. There had been an idea in Landresdale that Francis Tredethlyn would most likely buy up the Marquis's estate off-hand, and if practicable, make a handsome offer for the purchase of the title.

"I am sure, your feelings do you credit," said Mr. Penruffin, after that brief sense of disappointment; "I may say very great credit," he added, with emphasis—as if any display of feeling from the possessor of thirty thousand a year were specially meritorious. "I suppose you have come down this way to survey your property, sir, to look about you a little, eh?" inquired the landlord of the "Crown," when Francis had finished his frugal dinner.

"Not I," the young man answered; "I scarcely know what my property is yet, though the lawyers told me a long riddle about it. No, I've come on a very different errand," he added, gravely. "You remember my cousin, Susan Tredethlyn, I daresay? I have come to look for her."

Joseph Penruffin shook his head solemnly, and breathed a long sigh that was almost a groan.

"If that's your errand here, sir, I'm afraid it isn't likely to be a very fortunate one. Folks in Landresdale never expect to see Susan Tredethlyn again; she went away from the farm four years ago; no one knows exactly where she went; no one knows why she went. There's your uncle's old servants, Mr. Tredethlyn, of course they might have said something, if they'd liked to it. But you may as well go and question the tombstones in Landresdale Churchyard as question them. All I know, or all anybody knows in this place is, that your cousin Susan went away and never came back again; and it stands to reason that she must have done something very bad indeed, and made her father very desperate against her, before the old man would have gone and left all his money away from her—meaning no disrespect to you, sir, but only looking at it in the light of human nature in general," added the landlord, apologetically.

"I'll never believe that Susan Tredethlyn did anything wicked or unwomanly till her own lips tell me so," cried Francis, bringing his hand heavily down on the table. "She may have made my uncle desperate against her, that's likely enough, for he was always hard with her; and when I think of his having hoarded all this money, and remember the life my Susan used to lead, I can scarcely bring myself to believe that she was his own flesh and blood. I'll never believe that she did anything wrong. I'll never believe that she could grow to be anything different from what she was when I left home—an innocent, modest little creature, who was almost frightened of own pretty looks when she caught sight of herself in a glass. But I'm going up to the old house, and if Martha Dryscoll or her husband know anything of my lost cousin, I'll get the knowledge from them though I have to wring it out of their wizened old throats."

The young man rose as he said this, and took his hat and stick from a chair near the window. Joseph Penruffin watched him with something like alarm upon his countenance.

"You'll sleep here to-night, sir?" he asked.

"Yes; I'm going straight up to the Grange, and I don't know how long I may be gone; but I'll come back here to sleep. I should scarcely fancy lying down in one of those dreary old rooms; I should expect to see the wandering spirit of my lost cousin come and look in at me from the darkness outside my window. No; however late I may be, I'll come back here to sleep."

"And perhaps you'd like some little trifle for supper, sir, having made such an uncommon poor dinner," suggested the landlord—"a chicken and a little bit of grass, or a tender young duck and a dish of peas?"

But Francis Tredethlyn was walking up the little village street out of earshot of these savory suggestions before the landlord had finished his sentence.

"I don't call that manners," muttered Mr. Penruffin; "but I shall cook the chicken for ten o'clock, and chance it; he can afford to pay for it, whether he eats it or not. And I think, taking into consideration old acquaintance and thirty thousand a year, it would only have been friendly in Francis Tredethlyn if he'd ordered a bottle of wine with his dinner."

SOME years ago there was a bill introduced in the Georgia Legislature to lay a tax of ten dollars a year on all jackasses. Some appreciative member proposed to amend it so as to include lawyers and doctors. The amendment was accepted, and, amidst much jocularly, the bill passed. Several efforts have since been made to repeal it, but in vain, and to this day all jackasses, lawyers, and doctors are obliged to pay a yearly tax of ten dollars.

THE Duke of Nemours once sent his steward to call upon an artist on whom he wished to confer a snuff-box as a mark of his approbation to ascertain if such a present would be acceptable. The offer was received with enthusiasm. "Where shall I send it?" inquired the envoy. "Oh, if you would be kind enough," replied the grateful artist, "to pawn it on the way, you can let me have the money."

CHARLES WOLFE—AUTHOR OF "THE BURIAL OF SIR JOHN MOORE."

[THE following account of a visit to the grave of the author of the ode on the burial of Sir John Moore, is written by C. B. Gibson, in one of the English magazines. It is a sad commentary on the reward genius generally has from the world which applauds it, to learn that the author of an ode which Byron characterized as "the most perfect in the language," sleeps in a grave almost nameless, and overgrown with nettles.]

BY the southern wall, and beneath a southwestern segment of the great dome of St. Paul's Cathedral, stands a mural monument in white marble. It is "To the Memory of Sir John Moore," who fell at Corunna. There is at the head a winged woman, lowering the body of this brave soldier into the mausoleum, by means of a garland or rope of flowers. At the foot kneels a nude, or almost nude, man, engaged in the same operation, by the aid of a strap. On a block of white marble above stands a nude boy, trying to balance a long pole with a heavy standard. Beneath the figures are these lines:

No useless coffin enclosed his breast,
Nor in sheet nor in shroud we wound him;
But he lay like a warrior taking his rest,
With his martial cloak around him.

The Ode on the Burial of Sir John Moore, from which these lines are taken, has done more to immortalise this gallant general than a thousand marble monuments. At an after-dinner conversation between Lord Byron and Shelley, recorded by Capt. Medwin, the question arose as to which was the most perfect ode of the day. Shelley contended for Coleridge's ode on Switzerland, commencing "Ye clouds." Moore's melodies were quoted; and some one mentioned Campbell's Hohenlieden; when Lord Byron started up, and said—"I will show you an ode you have never seen, that I consider little inferior to the best which the present prolific age has brought forth." He left the table and returned with a magazine, from which he read the well-known lines on the "Burial of Sir John Moore," commencing:

Not a drum was heard, not a funeral note,
As his corse to the rampart we hurried.

"The feeling," says Medwin, "with which he recited these admirable stanzas I shall never forget. After he had come to the end he repeated the third, and said it was perfect, particularly the lines,

But he lay like a warrior taking his rest,
With his martial cloak around him."

It is not pleasant to reflect that the man who has cast such a halo of poetic glory around the far-off grave of a British soldier, should be sleeping at home in an unknown grave; that we should know so little of the young clergyman whose genius was as bright as his life was simple and his piety sincere.

About a mile from Cove, near Queenstown, on the Great Island, at the other side of the hill, and within the four walls of the old unroofed church of Clonmel—not the town of Clonmel, in the county Tipperary, but the parish of Clonmel, in the county Cork—repose the ashes of the Rev. Charles Wolfe, the author of this ode, and of many other pieces of great excellence.

Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Hall state, in their work on Ireland, that they visited the churchyard of Clonmel, and could not discover the poet's grave. As the writer of this paper was residing, at no distant period, in the neighborhood of Queenstown, he resolved to make it out, if marked by any sort of stone, for neither the gravedigger, the clerk, clergyman, nor "the oldest inhabitant," knew anything about it.

I went to Clonmel, accompanied by one of my daughters whose eyes are sharper than mine. We first took the circuit of this little cemetery, which is really a beautiful spot, and then the by-paths, and then across the graves, hither and thither, without finding it, when we entered the old unroofed church, and there, in a damp corner, overgrown with nettles, my daughter discovered the stone, with the poet's name inscribed, but sadly in need of the friendly chisel of some "Old" or new "Mortality."

I may here state that, within a few hundred yards of his grave, I found a thin slab of white marble, bearing the name of Thomas Tobin, author of the Honey-Moon, the Faro Table, Undertaker, and the School for Authors. The thin monumental slab, which had fallen from the wall, was left on the ground, to be trodden under the foot of men, or any animal that might wander that way. I thought the old ruined church, with its neglected and forgotten tenants and tombstone, a very excellent "School for Authors." This clever dramatist was born in Salisbury, in 1770, and died in 1804, in his thirty-fourth year, within sight of land, when on his way to the West Indies for the benefit of his health. His remains were brought to Cove, now Queenstown, and interred within the four walls of the old ruined church at Clonmel.

But to return to Charles Wolfe. I visited his grave a second time, accompanied by a literary friend, who told me the following interesting anecdote of his elegy on the burial of Sir John Moore. "Charles Wolfe," said he, "showed me the lines in manuscript, with the beauty of which I was so much impressed that I requested a copy for insertion in a periodical with which I had some connection. Wolfe first refused, but in the end complied. I laid the ode before two or three of the literary savants who were in the habit of deciding what should or should not appear in their periodical. The lines were read, condemned and ridiculed; and I was laughed at for imagining 'such stuff' worthy of publication. I felt myself in a very awkward position, but I got cleverly out of it. I wrote to Charles Wolfe, returning him his manuscript, saying, that on more mature consideration, I did not deem the periodical I had named worthy of its insertion."

The literary friend who told me this anecdote, and whose name without his permission I should not like to mention, furnished the poet, Thomas Moore, with some of the "stuff," or Irish music, to which he set some of his most beautiful melodies. I see by an old letter of Charles Wolfe, in the Royal Irish Academy, that he sent a copy of these lines to his friend "John Taylor, at the Rev. Mr. Armstrong's, Clonoulty, Cashel," on the 16th of September, 1816. "My dear John: I have completed the Burial of Sir John Moore, and will here inflict them on you. You have no one but yourself to blame—for praising the two stanzas—that I have told you so much."

We discover from the date of this letter to the Rev. John Taylor, (September, 1816,) that the ode was not finished till nearly eight years after the death of Sir John Moore, who fell in January, 1809.

War and warlike heroes seemed to be favorite themes with Charles Wolfe, who was descended of a family that produced the illustrious hero, General Wolfe, who fell before Quebec. Arma virumque cano seems to have been the poet's motto. When about eighteen years of age he wrote "Jugurtha incarcerated vitam ingemit relictam," a poem which possesses a great deal of dramatic power. It represents the Numidian Lion Jugurtha as caught and caged in the city of Rome, after having graced the procession of the victorious General Marius.

Charles Wolfe wrote a Spanish song commencing, "The chains of Spain are breaking, let Gaul despair and fly," and a noble piece on patriotism; but he has also composed lines of a more tender and pathetic nature. His most touching and beautiful is the elegy adapted to the Irish air of "Gramachree:"

If I had thought thou couldst have died,
I might not weep for thee,
But I forgot, when by thy side,
That thou couldst mortal be;
It never through my mind had passed,
The time would e'er be o'er,
That I on thee should look my last,
And thou shouldst smile no more.

And still upon that face I look,
And think 'twill smile again;
And still the thought I will not brook,
That I must smile in vain.
But when I speak thou dost not say,
What thou ne'er left'st unsaid;
And now I feel, as well I may,
Sweet Mary, thou art dead!

I understand he was asked by a friend if "Mary" ever existed, and that he replied in the negative, saying he had hummed or sung the air over and over, till he burst into a flood of salt tears, in which mood he composed the words. There is a tradition that Venus arose out of the sea, but we do not believe a word of it; and what is more, we are credibly informed that Charles Wolfe was in love with the beautiful Mary Grierson of Dublin, whose death he so eloquently laments.

Archdeacon Stuart, from whom I received this information concerning the poet, has furnished me with a sketch of his personal appearance, which may interest the reader:

"The name of Charles Wolfe is connected with the earliest recollections of my youth. In stature he was rather above the ordinary height, and his person was somewhat slight. His complexion was fair, approaching to redness. His hair, which hung in somewhat neglected and graceful ringlets, covered a high, but not very expansive forehead. His eye was not large, but a little prominent; the color blue, intermixed with a dark shade, which gave it the impress of intellect and intelligence."

Charles Wolfe was born in Dublin, December 14th, 1791. He was the youngest son of Theobald Wolfe, of the county Kildare, a family of some distinction. General Wolfe, who was killed at the siege of Quebec—as we have already stated—and the Irish judge, Lord Kilwarden, who was murdered by the followers of Emmett, as he drove, with his daughter, through Thomas Street, Dublin, were of the same family. The poet lost his father at an early age, and was sent to school at Bath, in 1801. From Bath he went to Salisbury, and from that to Winchester. In 1809 he entered the University of Dublin, where he gained a scholarship. In 1817 he was ordained to the curacy of Donoughmore, in the diocese of Armagh.

His habits and manner of life, as a clergyman, were exceedingly simple and primitive. He scarcely ever thought of providing a regular meal. His small cottage contained a few rush-bottomed chairs, a rickety table, and two trunks: one for his papers and the other for his linen. The trunks also did service by covering the broken parts of the floor. The damp paper hung in loose folds from the mouldy walls of the closet where he slept. A dangerous place for a man of a consumptive habit. Between the parlor and the closet was the kitchen, the warmest and most comfortable apartment of the three. This was occupied by a disbanded soldier, his wife, and a numerous band of children, who kept house for the minister, whom they entertained as a lodger, taking possession of the "bit of potato garden" (which went with the cottage) as lords of the soil.

The Archdeacon informed me that Charles Wolfe purchased a large store of shoes of all sizes, which he gave out on Saturday for the use of those who complained they could not go to church for want of shoes. The rule was to bring back the shoes on the Monday, but we suspect this was not always done, especially when a fair was approaching.

Charles Wolfe was at one time so abstracted—absorbed we have no doubt in the subject of his discourse—that he tied on his bands so as to cause them to fall down behind, instead of before, which "had a ludicrous effect."

We should scarcely expect to find the very highest specimens of pulpit eloquence addressed to a poor rural, and comparatively ignorant people; but it is from the fragments of this young man's sermons that Dr. Whately, the late Archbishop of Dublin, has selected specimens of the highest order of pulpit oratory, with which to illustrate and adorn his learned and elaborate treatise on elocution. We shall give but one example, which lack of space compels us to curtail. It occurs in the conclusion of a discourse on the words, "My yoke is easy, and my burden is light."

"Such is our yoke and burden. Let him who thinks it too hard and too heavy, be prepared to state it boldly when he shall appear side by side with the poor mistaken Indian, before the throne of God at the day of judgment. The poor heathen may come forward with his wounded limbs and weltering body, saying, 'I thought thee an austere master, delighting in the miseries of thy creatures, and I have brought thee the torn remnants of a body which I have tortured in thy service.' And the Christian will come forward and say, 'I knew that thou didst save me from such sufferings and torments, and that thou only commandedst me to keep my body in temperance, soberness, and chastity; but I thought this too hard for me.' What will be the answer of the Judge to the poor heathen, none can presume to say. That he was sadly mistaken in the means of salvation is beyond a doubt; but the Judge may say 'Come to me, thou heavy laden, and I will give thee rest which thou couldst not purchase for thyself.' But to the Christian—'Thou who hadst my easy yoke and light burden; thou for whom all was already purchased, thank God it is not yet pronounced! Begone and fly for thy life!'"

The Rev. Charles Wolfe died of consumption in the Cove of Cork. Writing to a friend under date of May 28th, 1821, he says, "At length the die is cast; the doctor has stripped me of my gown"—prohibited his preaching. Just before his death he began to pray for his friends, but his voice failing, he exclaimed, "God bless them all!" He then whispered to his sister—"Close this eye: the other is closed already; and now farewell."

I have said he was a student of Dublin College. Close beside his grave nestles another of the Alumni of the same Alma Mater. I think the name is Charles Connor, who died young. The two lie side by side covered with foliage, like the babes of the wood; but the foliage consists of rank nettles.

THE FALL OF A REPUBLIC.

MEN of that great Republic, whose light is over the round world now, too bright for the clouds of discord, treachery and war to dim, learn by the stories of the lesser lights which have shone before you, why they waxed and waned and were extinguished; so learn, that your own Republic may grow in brightness till the stars of history shall pale before its perfect day, and the whole race, taught by you, shall be ready to join the angels' song, "Peace on earth! Good will to all men!"

Before the eye of Columbus had seen, even in dreams, our distant land, then sleeping amid the oceans, the little City of Venice was a republic which gave law to empires, and made peace and war, fearlessly, with the greatest on the earth. Her soldiers were the most daring, her sailors the hardiest, her heroes the most famous the world contained; all men feared her. But, alas! her fall had to come. For her sons forgot the noble discontent of their fathers, which rested not in aught they had attained so long as better lay beyond; but they ate and drank and were satisfied. And it was thus she fell: From the time of her greatness years passed away in feasting and pleasure and celebrations. For were her people not rich and powerful and proud? And was not every day of the year the anniversary of some great victory of bygone times? The French Revolution struggled and stormed beyond the Alps, but what cared they? They laughed, and feasted ever—and boasted that they were free. Only one man arose among them, the Conde Pesaro, who besought and prayed them, as for his own life, that they would be free indeed; would be what they had been once—living, acting men. But no! they were rich, they were safe, they were gay; and Pesaro spoke in vain. Then came a half-starved, ragged host across the Alps, headed by a young adventurer without friends; but with tireless energy that host of restless men swept from battle-field to battle-field, and from victory to victory, knocked at the door of emperors, not taking No! for an answer, and swooped down on the thing misnamed the Venetian Republic, bidding it give up even its name as a nation. Then the wisest crowded round their last patriot to ask if this was the thing he had dreaded for them, and what they should do to be saved. But Pesaro knew that it was not to the French army, nor to the genius of Napoleon, that his people must fall, but to the lust of life, and the lust of riches, that had been eating their hearts away so long; and that nothing that could be done would avail to save them. The city that once was strong and proud as we are to-day was sold for a handful of gold; and there was not wanting in Venice a crowd, called rich and great and noble, to shout a welcome to its conqueror.

The patriot went forth into exile, alone, a man bereft of hope. No wife comforted his great sorrow, no child grew up to inherit from him the shame of the race he belonged to; he sold his rich estates and palaces, that his name might be forgotten where had been his home, and, dying, prayed that no nation might ever again be cursed, as his had been, with prosperity that brought it nothing better than gold, and with peace that made it endure shame, shrinking from the struggle that would have swept that shame away.

FLORENCE JAMES.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE'S DEATH.—The death of the Duke of Newcastle adds another to the long list of eminent statesmen who have been recently cut off in the prime of their lives, and the maturity of their powers. His grace did not, indeed, possess the distinguished abilities of many of his contemporaries and political associates whose loss we deplore. He was not a Dalhousie, a Herbert, a Lewis, or a Canning. But his talents were of no mean order; his judgment was sound, and in devotion to the public service he was surpassed by none. Entering life a Tory of the strictest sect, he became a Liberal in the best and truest sense of that word. Nor will any one venture to insinuate that this change in his views was due to anything but sincere conviction. For the Duke was a man both of rare conscientiousness and thorough independence of thought; and to a sense that this was the case he owed much of the influence which he possessed either in Parliament or in the country. He was not an administrator of the first class, but he did well whatever could be effected by patient labor, by sound common sense, and by the exercise of a thoroughly unbiased and impartial judgment. As a Colonial minister he was eminently successful in conciliating the attachment of our distant dependencies; and if he failed as a war minister it is now admitted on all hands that his failure involved no personal disgrace. It is, indeed, highly improbable that in the then state of our military organization any one could have done much better than he did; and it is certain that no one could have sustained with more dignity the storm of obloquy to which he was exposed. He bore his undeserved disgrace with the simple unaffected manliness which indeed so strikingly characterized him. The temporary shade cast upon his reputation soon passed away; and long before he resigned for the last time the seals of the Colonial Office he had come to be generally regarded as one of the most useful and valuable of our public servants. Although his career has terminated prematurely, he did not live in vain; for he afforded a bright example, not only to his own order, but to all those below him, by his earnest, unselfish, and zealous discharge of public duties, always of a most laborious, and frequently of a very thankless character.—London Review.

BOUND VOLUMES OF THE CALIFORNIAN.—Those wishing bound copies of the First Volume of THE CALIFORNIAN can procure them by leaving their orders at this office. The convenient form in which THE CALIFORNIAN is published, and the varied nature of its contents eminently fit it for preservation. In the current volume will be found the only English translation of La Comtesse Diane—the most brilliant of Mario Uchard's romances: also the story of Annie and her Master, one of the most charming and delicate stories ever published in any language; the romance of Mary Stuart and Chastelar—a thrilling reminiscence of Scotland's fair young Queen and her poet lover; and the Notting Hill Mystery, showing the unravelling of a terrible thread of crime strikingly analogous in all its salient details to the crime of La Pommerais, the French poisoner, whose late trial and execution are still fresh in the minds of all readers. This volume contains 432 pages. Subscribers for a bound copy can have their names handsomely lettered in gold upon the volume, and the book will be delivered at their residences on leaving their order and address. Price, $5, bound; unbound, $2.

San José occupies the position of the third city in the State. It polled 1,229 votes at the last election. Marysville comes fourth in order.

A LEGEND OF KNOCKMARY.

The following paper, by William Carleton, author of the Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry, gives a good idea of the strange hues which the national humor and fancy have thrown over most of the early popular legends of Ireland. Fin or Fion M'Coul is the same half-mythic being who figures as Fingal in Macpherson's Ossian's Poems. He was probably a distinguished warrior in some early stage of the history of Ireland; different authorities place him in the fifth and the ninth centuries. Whatever his real age, and whatever his real qualities, he was afterwards looked back to as a giant of immense size and strength, and became the subject of numerous wild and warlike legends both in Ireland and in the Highlands of Scotland.]

WHAT Irish man, woman, or child, has not heard of our renowned Hibernian Hercules, the great and glorious Fin M'Coul? Not one, from Cape Clear to the Giant's Causeway, nor from that back again to Cape Clear. And by the way, speaking of the Giant's Causeway brings me at once to the beginning of my story. Well, it so happened that Fin and his gigantic relatives were all working at the Causeway, in order to make a bridge, or what was still better, a good stout pad-road, across to Scotland; when Fin, who was very fond of his wife Oonagh, took it into his head that he would go home and see how the poor woman got on in his absence. To be sure, Fin was a true Irishman, and so the sorrow thing in life brought him back, only to see that he was snug and comfortable, and, above all things, that she got her rest well at night; for he knew that the poor woman, when he was with her, used to be subject to nightly qualms and configurations, that kept him very anxious, decent man, striving to keep her up to the good spirits and health that she had when they were first married. So, accordingly, he pulled up a fir-tree, and, after lopping off the roots and branches, made a walking-stick of it, and set out on his way too Oonagh.

Oonagh, or rather Fin, lived at this time on the very tip-top of Knockmary Hill, which faces a cousin of its own, called Cullamore, that rises up, half-hill, half-mountain, on the opposite side—east-east by south, as the sailors say, when they wish to puzzle a landsman.

Now, the truth is, for it must come out, that honest Fin's affection for his wife, though cordial enough in itself, was by no manner or means the real cause of his journey home. There was at that time another giant, named Cucullin—some say he was Irish, and some say he was Scotch—but whether Scotch or Irish, sorrow doubt of it but he was a targer. No other giant of the day could stand before him; and such was his strength, that, when well vexed, he could give a stamp that shook the country about him. The fame and name of him went far and near; and nothing in the shape of a man, it was said, had any chance with him in a fight. Whether the story is true or not, I cannot say, but the report went that, by one blow of his fist, he flattened a thunderbolt and kept it in his pocket, in the shape of a pancake, to show to all his enemies when they were about to fight him. Undoubtedly he had given every giant in Ireland a considerable beating, barring Fin M'Coul himself; and he swore, by the solemn contents of Moll Kelly's Primer, that he would never rest, night or day, winter or summer, till he would serve Fin with the same sance, if he could catch him. Fin, however, who no doubt was the cock of the walk on his own dunghill, had a strong disinclination to meet a giant who could make a young earthquake, or flatten a thunderbolt when he was angry; so he accordingly kept dodging about from place to place, not much to his credit as a Trojan, to be sure, whenever he happened to get the hard word that Cucullin was on the scent of him. This, then, was the marrow of the whole movement, although he put it on his anxiety to see Oonagh; and I am not saying but there was some truth in that too. However, the short and the long of it was, with reverence be it spoken, that he heard Cucullin was coming to the Causeway to have a trial of strength with him; and he was naturally enough seized, in consequence, with a very warm and sudden fit of affection for his wife, poor woman, who was delicate in her health, and leading, besides, a very lonely uncomfortable life of it (he assured them), in his absence. He accordingly pulled up the fir-tree, as I said before, and having snedded it into a walking-stick, set out on his affectionate travels to see his darling Oonagh on the top of Knockmary, by the way.

In truth, to state the suspicions of the country at the time, the people wondered very much why it was that Fin selected such a windy spot for his dwelling-house, and they even went so far as to tell him as much.

"What can you mane, Mr. McCoul," said they, "by pitching your tent upon the top of Knockmary, where you never are without a breeze, day or night, winter or summer, and where you're often forced to take your nightcap* without either going to bed or turning up your little finger; ay, an' where, besides this, the sorrow's own want of water?"

"Why," said Fin, "ever since I was the height of a round tower, I was known to be fond of having a good prospect of my own; and where the dickens, neighbors, could I find a better spot for a good prospect than the top of Knockmary? As for water, I am sinking a pump, and, please goodness, as soon as the Causeway's made, I intend to finish it."

* A common name for the cloud or rack that hangs, as a forerunner of wet weather, about the peak of a mountain.

Now, this was more of Fin's philosophy; for the real state of the case was that he pitched upon the top of Knockmary in order that he might be able to see Cucullin coming towards the house, and, of course, that he himself might go to look after his distant transactions in other parts of the country, rather than—but no matter—we do not wish to be too hard on Fin. All we have to say is that if he wanted a spot from which to keep a sharp look-out—and, between ourselves, he did want it grievously—barring Slieve Croob, or Slieve Donan, or its own cousin, Cullamore, he could not find a neater or more convenient situation for it in the sweet and sagacious province of Ulster.

"God save all here!" said Fin, good-humoredly, on putting his honest face into his own door.

"Musha Fin, avick, an' you're welcome home to your own Oonagh, yon darlin' bully." Here followed a smack that is said to have made the waters of the lake at the bottom of the hill curl, as it were, with kindness and sympathy.

"Faith," said Fin, "beautiful; an' how are you, Oonagh—and how did you sport your figure during my absence, my bilberry?"

"Never a merrier—as bouncing a grass widow as ever there was in sweet 'Tyronne among the bushes.'"

Fin gave a short, good-humored cough, and laughed most heartily, to show her how much he was delighted that she made herself happy in his absence.

"An' what brought you home so soon, Fin?" said she.

"Why, avonrneen," said Fin, putting in his answer in the proper way, "never the thing but the purest of love and affection for yourself. Sure you know that's truth, auyhow, Oonagh."

Fin spent two or three happy days with Oonagh, and felt himself very comfortable, considering the dread he had of Cucullin. This, however, grew upon him so much that his wife could not but perceive that something lay on his mind which he kept altogether to himself. Let a woman alone, in the meantime, for ferreting or wheedling a secret out of her good-man when she wishes. Fin was a proof of this.

"It's this Cucullin," said he, "that's troubling me. When the fellow gets angry, and begins to stamp, he'll shake you a whole townland; and it's well known that he can stop a thunderbolt, for he always carries one about him in the shape of a pancake, to show to any one that might misdoubt it."

As he spoke, he clapped his thumb in his mouth, which he always did when he wanted to prophesy or to know anything that happened in his absence; and the wife, who knew not what he did it for, said, very sweetly:

"Fin, darling, I hope you don't bite your thumb at me, dear?"

"No," said Fin; "but I bite my thumb, acushla," said he.

"Yes, jewel! but take care and don't draw blood," said she.

"Ah, Fin, don't, my bully—don't."

"He's coming," said Fin; "I see him below Dungannon."

"Thank goodness, dear! an' who is it, avick! Glory be to God!"

"That baste Cucullin," replied Fin; "and how to manage I don't know. If I run away, I am disgraced; and I know that sooner or later I must meet him, for my thumb tells me so."

"When will he be here?" said she.

"To-morrow, about two o'clock," replied Fin, with a groan.

"Well, my bully, don't be cast down," said Oonagh; "depend on me, and maybe I'll bring you better out of this scrape than ever you could bring yourself by your rule o' thumb."

This quieted Fin's heart very much, for he knew that Oonagh was hand and glove with the fairies; and, indeed, to tell the truth, she was supposed to be a fairy herself. If she was, however, she must have been a kind-hearted one; for, by all accounts, she never did anything but good in the neighborhood.

Now, it so happened that Oonagh had a sister named Granua living opposite them, on the very top of Cullamore, which I have mentioned already, and this Granua was quite as powerful as herself. The beautiful valley that lies between them is not more than about five miles broad, so that of a summer's evening Granua and Oonagh were able to hold many an agreeable conversation across it, from the one hill-top to the other. Upon this occasion, Oonagh resolved to consult her sister as to what was best to be done in the difficulty that surrounded them.

"Granua," said she, "are you at home?"

"No," said the other, "I'm picking bilberries in Althadawan," (Anglicé, the Devil's Glen.)

"Well," said Oonagh, "get up to the top of Cullamore, look about you, and then tell us what you see."

"Very well," replied Granua, after a few minutes, "I am there now."

"What do you see?" asked the other.

"Goodness be about us!" exclaimed Granua, "I see the biggest giant that ever was known, coming up from Dungannon."

"Ay," said Oonagh, "there's our difficulty. That giant is the great Cucullin; and he's now comin' up to lather Fin. What's to be done?"

"I'll call to him," she replied, "to come up to Cullamore and refresh himself, and may be that will give you and Fin time to think of some plan to get yourselves out of the scrape. But," she proceeded, "I'm short of butter, having in the house only half a dozen firkins, and I'd feel thankful, Oonagh, if you'd throw me up the largest miscann you have got; for, to tell you the truth, that same Cucullin is easier kept a week than a fortnight."

"I'll do that with a heart and a half," replied Oonagh; "and, indeed, Granua, I feel myself under great obligations to you for your kindness in keeping him off of us till we see what can be done; for what would become of us at all if anything happened Fin, poor man?"

She accordingly got the largest miscann of butter she had—which might be about the weight of a couple dozen millstones, so that you may easily judge of its size—and calling up to her sister, "Granua," said she, "are you ready? I'm going to throw you up a miscann, so be prepared to catch it."

"I will," said the other; "a good throw now, and take care it does not fall short."

Oonagh threw it; but in consequence of her anxiety about Fin and Cucullin, she forgot to say the charm that was to send it up, so that, instead of reaching Cullamore, as she expected, it fell about half-way between the two hills at the edge of the broad bog near Augher.

"My curse upon you!" she exclaimed; "you've disgraced me. I now change you into a grey stone. Lie there as a testimony of what has happened: and may evil betide the first living man that will ever attempt to remove or injure you!"

And, sure enough, there it lies to this day, with the mark of the four fingers and thumb imprinted in it, exactly as it came out of her hand.

"Never mind," said Granua; "I must only do the best I can with Cucullin. If all fail, I'll give him a cast of heather broth to keep the wind out of his stomach, or a panada of oak-bark to draw it in a bit; but, above all things, think of some plan to get Fin out of the scrape he's in, otherwise he's a lost man. You know you used to be sharp and ready-witted; and my own opinion, Oonagh, is that it will go hard with you, or you'll outdo Cucullin yet."

She then made a high smoke on the top of the hill, after which she put her finger in her mouth, and gave three whistles, and by that Cucullin knew that he was invited to Cullamore—for this was the way that the Irish long ago gave a sign to all strangers and travellers, to let them know they were welcome to come and take share of whatever was going.

In the meantime Fin was very melancholy, and did not know what to do, or how to act at all. Cucullin was an ugly customer, no doubt, to meet with; and, moreover, the idea of the confounded "cake" aforesaid, flattened the very heart within him. What chances could he have, strong and brave though he was, with a man who could, when put in a passion, wake the country into earthquakes and knock thunderbolts into pancakes? The thing was impossible; and Fin knew not on what hand to turn him. Right or left—backward or forward—where to go he could form no guess whatsoever.

"Oonagh," said he, "can you do nothing for me? Where's all your invention? Am I to be skivered like a rabbit before your eyes, and to have my name disgraced forever in the sight of all my tribe, and me the best man among them? How am I to fight this man-mountain—this huge cross between an earthquake and a thunderbolt?—with a pancake in his pocket that was once!"

"Be easy, Fin," replied Oonagh; "troth, I'm ashamed of you. Keep your toe in your pump, will you? Talking of pancakes, maybe we'll give him as good as any he brings with him—thunderbolt or otherwise. If I don't treat him to as smart feeding as he's got this many a day, never trust Oonagh again. Leave him to me, and do you just as I bid you."

This relieved Fin very much; for, after all, he had great confidence in his wife, knowing, as he did, that she had got him out of many a quandary before. The present, however, was the greatest of all; but still he began to get courage, and was able to eat his victuals as usual. Oonagh then drew the nine woollen threads of different colors, which she always did to find out the best way of succeeding in anything of importance she went about. She then platted them into three plats with three colors in each, putting one on her right arm, one round her heart, and the third round her right ankle, for then she knew that nothing could fail with her that she undertook.

Having everything now prepared, she sent round to the neighbors and borrowed one-and-twenty iron griddles, which she took and put into one-and-twenty cakes of bread, and these she baked on the fire in the usual way, setting them aside in the cupboard according as they were done. She then put down a large pot of new milk, which she made into curds and whey, and gave Fin due instructions how to use the curds when Cucullin should come. Having done all this, she sat down quite contented, waiting for his arrival on the next day about two o'clock, that being the hour at which he was expected—for Fin knew as much by the sucking of his thumb. Now, this was a curious property that Fin's thumb had; but, notwithstanding all the wisdom and logic he used to suck out of it, it could never have stood to him here were it not for the wit of his wife. In this very thing, moreover, he was very much resembled by his great foe Cucullin; for it was well known that the huge strength he possessed all lay in the middle finger of his right hand, and that, if he happened by any mischance, to lose it, he was no more, notwithstanding his bulk than a common man.

At length, the next day, he was seen coming across the valley, and Oonagh knew that it was time to commence operations. She immediately made the cradle, and desired Fin to lie down in it, and cover himself up with the clothes.

"You must pass for your own child," said she; "so just lie there snug and say nothing, but be guided by me." This, to be sure, was wormwood to Fin—I mean going into the cradle in such a cowardly manner—but he knew Oonagh well; and finding that he had nothing else for it, with a very rueful face he gathered himself into it, and lay snug as she had desired him.

About two o'clock, as he had been expected, Cucullin came in. "God save all here!" said he; "is this where the great Fin McCool lives?"

"Indeed it is, honest man," replied Oonagh; "God save you kindly—won't you be sitting?"

"Thank you, ma'am," says he sitting down; "you're Mrs. McCool, I suppose?"

"I am," said she; "and I have no reason, I hope, to be ashamed of my husband."

"No," said the other; "he has the name of being the strongest and bravest man in Ireland; but for all that, there's a man not far from you that's very desirous of taking a shake with him. Is he at home?"

"Why, then, no," she replied; "and if ever a man left his house in a fury, he did. It appears that some one told him of a big bosthoon of a giant called Cucullin being down at the Causeway to look for him; and so he set out there to try if he could catch him. Troth, I hope, for the poor giant's sake, he won't meet with him, for if he does, Fin will make paste of him at once."

"Well," said the other, "I am Cucullin, and I have been seeking him these twelvemonths, but he always kept clear of me; and I'll never rest night or day till I lay hands on him."

At this Oonagh set up a loud laugh, of great contempt, by the way, and looked at him as if he was only a mere handful of a man.

"Did you ever see Fin?" said she, changing her manner all at once.

"How could I?" said he; "he always took care to keep his distance."

"I thought so," she replied; "I judged as much; and if you take my advice, you poor-looking creature, you'll pray night and day that you may never see him, for I tell you it will be a black day for you when you do. But, in the mean time, you perceive that the wind's on the door, and as Fin himself is from home, maybe you'd be civil enough to turn the house, for it's always what Fin does when he's here."

This was a startler even to Cucullin; but he got up, however, and after pulling the middle finger of his right hand until it cracked three times, he went outside, and getting his arms about the house, completely turned it as she had wished. When Fin saw this, he felt a certain description of moisture, which shall be nameless, oozing out through every pore of his skin; but Oonagh, depending upon her woman's wit, felt not a whit daunted.

"Arrah, then," said she, "as you are so civil, maybe you'd do another obliging turn for us, as Fin's not here to do it himself. You see, after this long stretch of dry weather we've had, we feel very badly off for want of water. Now, Fin says there's a fine spring well somewhere under the rocks behind the hill here below, and it was his intention to pull them asunder; but having heard of you, he left the place in such a fury that he never thought of it. Now, if you try to find it, troth I'd feel it a kindness."

She then brought Cucullin down to see the place, which was then all one solid rock; and, after looking at it for some time, he cracked his right middle finger nine times, and, stooping down, tore a cleft about two hundred feet deep, and a quarter of a mile in length, which has since been christened by the name of Lumford's Glen. This feat nearly threw Oonagh herself off her guard; but what won't a woman's sagacity and presence of mind accomplish?

"You'll now come in," said she, "and eat a bit of such humble fare as we can give you. Fin, even although he and you are enemies, would scorn not to treat you kindly in his own house; and, indeed, if I didn't do it even in his absence, he would not be pleased with me."

She accordingly brought him in, and placing half a dozen of the cakes we spoke of before him, together with a can or two of butter, a side of boiled bacon, and a stalk of cabbage, she desired him to help himself—for this, be it known, was long before the invention of potatoes. Cucullin, who, by the way, was a glutton as well as a hero, put one of the cakes in his mouth to take a huge whack out of it, when both Fin and Oonagh were stunned with a noise that resembled something between a growl and a yell. "Fury!" he shouted; "how is this? Here are two of my teeth out! What kind of bread is this you gave me?"

"What's the matter?" said Oonagh coolly.

"Matter?" shouted the other again; "why, here are the two best teeth in my head gone!"

"Why," said she, "that's Fin's bread, the only bread he ever eats when at home; but, indeed, I forgot to tell you that nobody can eat it but himself, and that child in the cradle there. I thought, however, that, as you were reported to be rather a stout little fellow of your size, you might be able to manage it, and I did not wish to affront a man that thinks himself able to fight Fin. Here's another cake, maybe it's not so hard as that."

Cucullin at the moment was not only hungry but ravenous, so he accordingly made a fresh set at the second cake, and immediately another yell was heard twice as loud as the first. "Thunder and gibles!" he roared, "take your bread out of this, or I will not have a tooth in my head; there's another pair of them gone!"

"Well, honest man," replied Oonagh, "if you're not able to eat the bread, say so quietly, and don't be wakening the child in the cradle there. There, now, he's awake upon me."

Fin now gave a skirl that startled the giant, as coming from such a youngster as he was represented to be. "Mother, I'm hungry," said he; "get me something to eat." Oonagh went over, and putting into his hand a cake that had no griddle in it, Fin, whose appetite in the meantime was sharpened by what he saw going forward, soon made it disappear. Cucullin was thunderstruck, and secretly thanked his stars that he had the good fortune to miss meeting with Fin, for, as he said to himself, I'd have no chance with a man who could eat such bread as that, which even his son that's but in his cradle can munch before my eyes."

"I'd like to take a glimpse at the lad in the cradle," said he to Oonagh; "for I can tell you that the infant who can manage that nutriment is no joke to look at, or to feed, of a scarce summer."

"With all the veins of my heart," replied Oonagh. "Get up, acushla, and show this decent little man something that won't be unworthy of your father, Fin McCool."

Fin, who was dressed for the occasion as much like a boy as possible, got up, and bringing Cucullin out—"Are you strong?" said he.

"Thunder an' ounds!" exclaimed the other, "what a voice in so small a chap!"

"Are you strong?" said Fin again; "are you able to squeeze water out of that white stone?" he asked, putting one into Cucullin's hand. The latter squeezed and squeezed the stone, but to no purpose: he might pull the rocks of Lumford's Glen asunder, and flatten a thunderbolt, but to squeeze water out of a white stone was beyond his strength. Fin eyed him with great contempt, as he kept straining and squeezing, and squeezing and straining, till he got black in the face with the efforts.

"Ah, you're a poor creature!" said Fin. "You a giant! Give me the stone here, and when I show what Fin's little son can do, you may then judge of what my daddy himself is."

Fin then took the stone, and slyly exchanging it for the curds, he squeezed the latter until the whey, as clear as water, oozed out in a little shower from his hand.

"I'll now go in," said he, "to my cradle; for I'd scorn to lose my time with any one that's not able to eat my daddy's bread, or squeeze water out of a stone. Bedad, you had better be off out of this before my daddy comes back; for if he catches you, it's in paste he'd have you in two minutes."

Cucullin, seeing what he had seen, was of the same opinion himself; his knees knocked together with the terror of Fin's return, and he accordingly hastened in to bid Oonagh farewell, and to assure her, that from that day out, he never wished to hear of, much less to see, her husband. "I admit fairly that I'm not a match for him," said he, "strong as I am; tell him I will avoid him as I would the plague, and that I will make myself scarce in this part of the country while I live."

Fin, in the mean time, had gone into the cradle, where he lay very quietly, his heart at his mouth with delight that Cucullin was about to take his departure without discovering the tricks that had been played off on him.

"It's well for you," said Oonagh, "that he doesn't happen to be here, for it's nothing but hawk's meat or flummery he'd make of you."

"I know that," says Cucullin; "not a thing else he'd make of me; but before I go, will you let me feel what kind of teeth that can eat griddle bread like that"—and he pointed to it as he spoke.

"With all pleasure in life," said she; "only, as they're far back in his head, you must put your finger a good way in."

Cucullin was surprised to find such a powerful set of grinders in one so young; but he was still much more so on finding when he took his hand from Fin's mouth, that he had left the very finger upon which his whole strength depended behind him. He gave one loud groan, and fell down at once with terror and weakness. This was all Fin wanted, who now knew that his most powerful and bitterest enemy was completely at his mercy. He instantly started out of the cradle, and in a few minutes the great Cucullin, that was for such a length of time the terror of him and all his followers, lay a corpse before him. Thus did Fin, through the wit and invention of Oonagh, his wife, succeed in overcoming his enemy stratagem, which he never could have done by force; and thus also is it proved that the women, if they bring us into many an unpleasant scrape, can sometimes succeed in getting us out of others that are quite as bad.

ANECDOTE FROM THE "CAUSES CELEBRES."—In the reign of Don Pedro, the justice-lover, King of Portugal, (says the compiler of the Causes Celebres,) a prelate of high rank and standing in the kingdom chanced to take offence at some expression used towards him by a shoemaker, and caused the poor man to be assassinated. The punishment, so grievously disproportioned to the offence, was formally complained of in the ecclesiastical courts by the son of the victim; but, as might have been expected, the judges favored their wealthy and powerful brother, and bestowed on him no heavier penalty than that of interdicting him from saying mass for the space of a year. The son, feeling even more aggrieved by this sentence, went to the foot of the throne, and there laid his complaint before Don Pedro. The king was touched by compassion, and expressed that sentiment, as well as his sense of the injustice of the decision alluded to, in a way so peculiar, that the young man was encouraged to act in a most remarkable manner in consequence. On an early day afterwards, the prelate took part in a public procession. He was clad in his full pontifical robes, and little dreamed of the fate which awaited him. The son of the murdered shoemaker had taken up his station at a point which was overlooked by the king, who, with all his court, viewed the procession from the palace windows. When the prelate reached the proper spot the young man darted forward, and, with two blows of a poignard well applied, slew the priest ere any man could interpose to stop the action. Such violence, committed on an ecclesiastic of high station, caused an extraordinary sensation. The assassin was at once seized and carried before Don Pedro, by orders of the monarch himself. As soon as the young man appeared the king demanded how he dared to commit such a deed? "How dared that unworthy prelate to murder my father?" was the reply. "I sought justice, and it was refused to me. I believed then that it was my duty to take vengeance into my own hands." The friends of the prelate replied, that the youth had received justice, and that the prelate had been condemned to cease performance of the mass for a whole year. The king listened in silence, and then turned to the young man. "What is thy trade?" "A shoemaker," was the reply. "I then interdict thee from making shoes for a year, and in the interval thou shalt receive fit maintenance from the prelate's funds. This is my decree."

ANECDOTE OF MALIBRAN.—One evening she felt rather annoyed at the general prejudice, expressed by the company then present, against all English vocal compositions, the opinion being altogether in favor of foreign music; some even going so far as to assert that nothing could be good of which the air was originally and entirely of English extraction. Malibran in vain endeavored to maintain that all countries possess, though perhaps in a less equal degree, many ancient melodies, peculiarly their own; that nothing could exceed the beauty of the Scottish, Irish, Welsh, and even some of the old English airs. She then named many compositions of our best modern composers, Bishop, Barnett, Lee, Horn, etc., declaring her belief that if she were to produce one of Bishop's or Horn's ballads as the works of a Signor Vescovo, or Cuerno, thus Italianising or Espagnolising their names, they would faire fureur. In the midst of this discussion she volunteered a new Spanish song, composed, as she said, by a Don Chocarria. She commenced—the greatest attention prevailed; she touched the notes lightly, introducing variations on repeating the symphony, and with a serious feeling, though a slight smile might be traced on her lips, began:

Maria trayga un caldero
De aqua, Llama levanto
Maria pon tu caldero
Ayamos nuestro te.

She finished—the plaudits resounded, and the air was quoted as a further example how far superior foreign talent was to English. Malibran assented to the justice of their remarks, and agreed to yield still more to their argument, if the same air sung adagio should be found equally beautiful when played presto. The parties were agreed; when, to the positive consternation of all present, and very much to the diversion of Malibran herself, the Spanish melody, which she had so divinely sung, was, on being played quick, instantly recognized as a popular English nursery song, by no means of the highest class. Shall we shock our readers when we remind them that means literally, "Molly, put the kettle on!"—Memoirs of Malibran.

Maria trayga un caldero,

NOTICE

The publication of "THE CALIFORNIAN" takes place on Saturday mornings, and copies may be obtained in the City at all News-stands, and of our News-agents through the country. It will also be served by carriers on the morning of publication.

* Correspondents will address all business communications to "THE CALIFORNIAN," No. 328 Montgomery street, San Francisco. All contributions intended for the paper, and all communications that concern its editorial conduct, direct to C. H. WEBB, editor "CALIFORNIAN," as above.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1864.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

THE President's Message has been laid before Congress and the telegraph yesterday morning laid it before California. Necessarily its reproduction in our columns is forbidden by its length, and a brief synopsis of its contents could not prove very satisfactory to the reader. It would be unfair to criticize the rhetoric of a document after its subjection to telegraphic catachresis by transmission across a continent, and even at its worst feature the present Message is better in composition than the one which accompanied Mr. Lincoln's inauguration, offering a marked improvement in grammar. It is clear and concise as the nature and extent of the ground thought necessary to go over would admit, and its principal features are an avoidance of suggestions and a close confinement to figures and facts, the whole document only exhibiting one rhetorical flight. It is not to be expected that in a land where everything about the machinery of Government is open to the daily comment and inspection of the people and the press, the President can reveal anything in an Annual Message with which the country is not already tolerably familiar; hence we find nothing very new or startling in the document before us. It will strike the reader as somewhat strange that in treating of our foreign relations the Executive should omit all mention of the footing upon which we stand with England and France, while our relations with Mexico, the South American States and Liberia are amplified upon at length. From the fact that no understanding between these two principal powers and our own is spoken of, we surely are not to conclude that no understanding exists. For an explanation of all apparent omissions and inconsistencies, however, we are content to wait until the faithful mail brings us the message as it fell from the President's pen, for the telegraph is a poor interpreter. Under any circumstances it is reasonable to conclude that our shrewd Executive, surrounded by the wisest statesmen of the nation, has too clear an idea of what he is about to be betrayed into a fatal blunder in any relations, either domestic or foreign.

THE POISONING MANIA.

THE Borgian era seems to have been revived. Although the secret of the Aqua Tofana slumbers in the grave of the beautiful but pitiless Lucrezia, ratsbane, strychnine and hellebore may be readily obtained at the druggist's. And if a man be wearied of his mistress or his mother, if a son wish by hastening his progenitor from the world to quicken his succession to property, or if a woman desire to exchange the shackled condition of wifedom for the unfettered liberty of widowhood, they have but to step round the corner to the convenient apothecary. Poisons are sold as unrestrictedly as provisions; and if the mania for their use continue unabated, it is highly probable that ere another decade Toxicology will be taught as a necessary branch of education in our common schools.

In this new method of launching death we have an innovation—perhaps we should say improvement—on the one which prevailed in the earlier settlement of the country. Then it was a blow with a pickaxe or a half-dozen holes drilled through the victim by one of those contrivances that have made the name of Colt famous the world over. Aesthetics were not much attended to in that early day, but a riper civilization brings its morals and amenities in murder. Hence the late preference for poison, and not without reason, for of all the many methods by which an individual may rid himself of inconvenient and impertinent relatives, or of disagreeable friends, it bears the palm, and for many reasons. In the first place, it seems to promise a comparative immunity from detection. Blundering physicians lay the sudden death occasioned at the door of some disease with an outlandish name, the morbid feeling of friends interferes in many instances to prevent an autopsy, and the body of the victim, in nine cases out of ten, is bundled into the earth and buried with the crime. Again, there are many delicate souls that would shrink from the actual shedding of blood, perhaps faint at its sight, that can yet insinuate the poisonous sublimate into a pudding or a pie without doing much violence to their refined sensibilities. And while it requires a strong hand to drive home the knife, or a cool hand to manipulate the trigger of a pistol, death, with the poison, may be launched by the weakest woman or the veriest coward.

The result of these fatal facilities—facilities of which murderers all the world over seem very suddenly to have become conscious—is found in every newspaper which we open. Here a wife has been poisoned, there a husband; now it is a single individual and anon intelligence of the poisoning of a whole family or a company of soldiers comes to swell the horrid catalogue.

The rapid increase of this most dangerous and detestable of crimes demands that some means be adopted to check its further growth and spread. In the first place, let us suggest that the facility with which poisons are at present obtained should be materially lessened. Let it be made penal for a druggist to sell poison under any circumstances to a stranger, or even to a townsman, without some guarantee as to the intentions, and in no case let it be sold without the name of the buyer being registered, and also the date of the sale. At present, druggists are so accommodating that they would deal out a pound of prussic acid or a few ounces of strychnine at the request of a child or the demand of a lunatic, pocket the money therefor, and "ask no questions." Indeed, so ready are they to swell the mortuary list, that they sometimes give out a deadly drug when an innocuous medicine is asked for.

ABOUT EDITING.

A GREAT mistake exists in supposing that in the conduct of a paper the editor consults his own taste alone. Unfortunately, he is not at liberty to do this. It is to the public that his paper looks for support, and it is the popular taste that he must consult if he would have his paper live. A notable instance of this was given in the Vigilance Committee times: two papers that came out and spoke the honest sentiments of their editors found a death from which there was no resurrection; the journals which felt the popular pulse and guided their conduct accordingly live to this day, sources of wealth to their proprietor and monuments to their sagacity in that particular, at least.

That the editor is not at liberty to consult his own taste alone is especially true in the matter of selections. The paper must be so diversified in its contents as to meet the tastes of all, or its circulation will necessarily be limited to a few. One man wants "solid reading," heavy articles after the pattern which the English reviews furnish; another likes sporting items, while yet another would like news and startling disclosures to the exclusion of everything else. Scientific persons and those of a theological turn of mind, think that more space should be given to articles calculated to fit their peculiar temperaments, utterly refusing to accept serials as serious things. The blue-eyed girl who has lately returned from boarding-school throws down the paper with contempt unless it contain a nice love story or two, or some impassioned sonnet to Mary or the Moon; while the matron, on the other hand, thinks that nothing is so good for steady family reading as recipes for pickling peanuts or cheap remedies for the croup in children. One individual insists on being tickled into laughter, while another, of a solemn frame of mind takes it as an insult if a paragraph is even pointed towards his ribs.

The fact of the matter is, that in conducting a newspaper the editor must consult the taste of all classes of readers, only permitting his own to cast the decisive vote when a question arises as to what that taste may be. The old simile of Scylla and Charybdis utterly fails to illustrate the difficulty of his position; it is amongst an archipelago of inclinations and ten thousand whirlpools of temper that he is expected to steer, without impinging upon the ones or drawing too near to the edges of the others. Very possibly if the editor of a paper were at liberty to consult his own inclinations alone, the Sorrows of a Sausage-Maker in prose, or the Aspirations of a Bellows-Mender in verse, would never see the light of day in his columns. But there are five hundred of his subscribers who would feel personally defrauded were they not permitted to sob with the sausage-maker or blow with the bellows-mender, so in compliment to these five hundred subscribers the scissors are brought into play and these articles are transferred from The Ladies Nambly Pambly to a copy book in the composition room—a book where he would gladly see the authors hanging instead of the articles. In selections for THE CALIFORNIAN we have endeavored as far as possible to be guided by the better taste of the community; if ever it become necessary for the success of the journal to cater to any other, it will be done under protest, and the Editor's name will be withdrawn from conspicuous notice.

THE "Campanalogians"—anglice for Swiss Bell-Ringers—are performing at the Academy of Music. The entertainment is an excellent one, the sight of the picturesquely-dressed and nimble-fingered troupe chiming music out from scores of different toned bells offering a curious study. The singing of Miss Kempton and Mr. Hayward in itself offers an attraction worth double the small price of admission charged. During the coming week the performance will be confined to Tuesday Thursday and Saturday evenings and Saturday afternoons.

The telegraph informs us that the Governor of Georgia has pardoned all the convicts out from the Penitentiary and sent them to the front as soldiers. It has been remarked that the Confederate authorities, to swell the ranks of their armies, have robbed the cradle and the grave. Do they now propose to rob the gallows, as well?

NEW BOOKS.

KNOWING in their kind hearts that we have little space this week, owing to the pressure of long stories and advertisements—principally the latter—upon our columns, Roman & Co. refrain from loading our table with books this time, sending, with admirable judgment, only a few, and confining the selection to ones that may be noticed in a paragraph.

In The Hawaiian Islands, the Rev. Rufus Anderson treats at some length of that kingdom, with whose shores we maintain a somewhat eccentric intercourse by the aid of brigs, barks, and schooners. Commencing with the discovery of those islands, when the free and festive Kanaka fed upon the fruit of the cocoa-nut, occasionally varying that vegetable diet with a cutlet or chop from an enemy slain or captured in battle, we are carried in regular gradation through the subsequent period when he acquired a vitiated taste for missionary steaks, until the story finds him in the present period of his ripe refinement, familiar with shirt-collars, small-pox, and the other blessings of civilization. The frontispiece of the book furnishes us with a portrait of his Majesty, Kamehameha III., rather a good-looking gentleman, though slightly off-color, wearing a star which gives him somewhat the rakish air of one of our policemen. Thanking Mr. Anderson for his clemency in not ringing in a conundrum upon us of: Why are these islands so called? telling us in answer that it is on account of the sand which is there, we hand the book over to the poetess Clare, and the poet Stoddard, who have lately returned from a several years' sojourn at the court of Kani, for a more extended notice—by extended we do not mean a notice which shall "lay it out."

From Dan to Beersheba is the title of a book by the Rev. J. P. Newman. This is not, as our friends on Montgomery street might at first blush suppose, an attempt on the part of some broker named Dan to bear Sheba, neither is it the report or any fraction of the report which Professor Silliman recently made of that excellent but extremely uncertain mine, on the strength of which a number of enterprising speculators of all sexes bought in, and got in, just in time to be saddled with the assessment which the Directors levied immediately on reading the Professor's report. On the contrary, this is an expansion of a series of letters published by the author in the Methodist, during a journey to and through the Holy Land; the book narrates what the author saw and felt during his travels, and is illustrated by plates.

It is only necessary to become a successful General or a probable President to have one's life written—think of that, boys—and in The Hero Boy the Rev. P. C. Headley gives us the life of Gen. Grant, adapted to the youthful mind, and calculated to move both boys and girls with military enthusiasm. One anecdote in the book we have never seen before, and it strikes us as being so funny that next week will see it in print, unless another crowd comes on these columns.

We have Bayard Taylor's Poems, in blue and gold. Mr. Taylor is a successful author and a smooth writer of verse. His verse does not often stir the blood like strong wine, as that of some other bards does, but it is pleasant and the sentiment is always pure. "The Poet's Journal," one of his later works, and the leader in the present volume, never won upon us to any great degree; aside from a not very modest self-assertion in the title, the whole thing seems an apology for getting married again. It were well enough whispered to the wife, but the necessity for sharing the confidence with the world at large is scarcely apparent.

The privations and sufferings of United States officers and soldiers while prisoners of war in rebel hands, are told in a pamphlet which we receive from Roman. It is the report in full of a Commission of Inquiry appointed by the Sanitary Commission; and a more sickening detail of cruelty and wrong we venture to say, has never before been published. One wonders how such inhumanities can be perpetrated, and for the sake of our common country and the relations which we once bore with the rebels now in arms, would willingly disbelieve the damning testimony, were it possible. But unfortunately every detail is too well authenticated. A circulation of this pamphlet in the army will have a deal to do with making our men fight to the last, for after its perusal death commends itself as a blessed alternative to the tender mercies of the rebel authorities.

INCENDIARISM IN NEW YORK.—A telegram dated New York, November 26th, states that the St. Nicholas, St. James, Lafayette, Metropolitan, Astor, Lovejoy's and Belmont Hotels, were fired by incendiaries the night previous, but the damage done was trifling. In the hotels the bed clothes, and some trunks were found covered with phosphorous; matches were also scattered in the beds; the fires were set and the rooms locked. Perhaps they are fired by delinquent boarders as the easiest way of settling their bills. The Occidental, Lick and Russ had better be watchful unless times improve.

THE poem called "The Love Knot," by Norah Perry, to be found in another column, must not be confounded with the "Love Not" of the Hon. Mrs. Norton. The difference between the two poems is notable.

OUR ATLANTIC GOSSIP.

[CORRESPONDENCE OF "THE CALIFORNIAN."]

["Go from home to hear news"—else have it brought to you from a distance. It will perhaps surprise Mr. Raymond to learn that he is "brother-in-law to the Harper boys," but the information certainly will not surprise him any more than it did us. Other passages in the following letter may surprise the parties whose names are mentioned, but the items come to us from New York, and we return them to New York to be passed upon. It is not for us to gainsay the word of a correspondent who dates from that city:]

NEW YORK, December 2, 1864.

THE country, like a great lubberly patient, will have got over its political fever by another week, and have only its old military rash to attend to. Words and bets run high at present; much oil is shed upon the altar of the Constitution nightly, and the usual ample measure of threats, bribes, oaths and nicknames, is rather increased than diminished. Half the energy developed upon both sides might have finished up the war long ago; but, between you and me, there are plenty of folk in both the Democratic ranks who would be seriously incommenced if the Rebellion should cease. It is not a question of policy or sentiment, but of spoils, to such. The rancor of these night owls is so repulsive to me that, leaving the Presidential election out of the question, I shall proceed to "buzz" of lighter and less controverted matters.

We have had but three or four nights of opera, none of them sensational. The ladies miss Brignoli, who has gone, like a truant seraph, leaving a wreck of broken hearts and moistened handkerchiefs behind him, and the opera buildings are tenanted at present by all sorts of peripatetics, who fret and fume for their brief hour, and then are heard no more.

John Owens is the popular dramatic man just now, though Artemus Ward, having opened a permanent hall on Broadway, near Grace Church, is much quoted and crowded upon. A. Ward is a singular character, one of the shrewdest men I ever knew, but a great wine-bibber, and many of his best things are picked up in places of imbibition where cheap wits congregate. He is not capable of any prolonged humorous effort. A weekly paper in this town offered him fifty dollars a-piece for a series of short articles, but he wrote one, and pegged out immediately. His present entertainment is backed up by a panorama, with which he means to travel East and West.

Edwin Forrest has finished at Niblo's and pushed into New England. Say what we will of his marked individuality, he is our representative tragedian, and when he passes away we shall have no one to wear his sandals. Forrest's engagements terminate only by his own whim. He could play old characters all the year round, and fill the colosseum. Personally he is a hard hater, but, if one do not cross him, a very interesting and original companion. I have twice or thrice had the pleasure of meeting him in his own residence at Philadelphia, where he is a good host, and has plenty to show of the rare in art and literature. Few men in America have such good libraries, and read so much of them: few have as tasteful pictures and enjoy them so truly. I do not think his judgment equal to his talent; and have never known a public man so temperate in his acts and so intemperate in his opinions.

The artists are as busy as artists ever are, in a society whose æsthetic cultivation might, to say the least, be improved. F. B. Carpenter has painted old Abe and cabinet meditating the Emancipation proclamation—a series of portraits, simply, and of a sort with the huge deformities in the Capitol rotunda at Washington, where Turnbull's "great ship-piece," as Randolph named his "Signing of the Declaration," still retains its superiority. It would surprise you to find how few men do the designing for a great mart like this. When you pass Darley, Hoppin, White and McLellan, you have few more than passable designers. The four I have mentioned are run down with orders; the rest do very little. I have heard that the Illustrated London News is to be reproduced in this city, which already reprints Blackwood and the four British Reviews, and will in a week or two issue All the Year Round, as well. We cannot compete with such clever publications; for the fact is that we have not in America any serial edited upon methodical or philosophical principles. The Atlantic Monthly is essentially a clique publication, without an editor. Lowell used to take care of it, but since his transfer to the North American Review, James T. Fields has managed it after a fashion. The Atlantic has printed nothing noticeable since the issue of Gilmore's "Visit to Richmond" in company with Col. Jacques. That was, in general estimation, a disgraceful paper—a revelation of confidential conversation, and worthy only of a paltry penny-a-liner. Miss Prescott's stories in the Atlantic have not the spirit of the "Amber Gods," her best composition. Mere beauty of style will tire us, after a time, and beyond this, the lady in question has little merit. She can paint a goose's leather till it rivals tropical foliage; but she has luck with her writings; the women like them; and she recently sold to the New York Weekly Mercury four stories for five hundred dollars.

Harpers' Magazine is better edited than the Atlantic, but half its articles are English reprints or compilations of books.

Dr. Guernsey controls it. He was originally a printer's devil in the establishment of the Harpers; but as the firm at that time was issuing many technical and classical works, they were sadly in want of a proof-reader, so young Guernsey was sent to college by them and thoroughly educated. The Harpers made a mistake in supposing that one so learned would be content with a proof-reader's post; he was now promoted to the editorship of the magazine—which, by the way, had been originally projected by Henry J. Raymond, now editor of the Times, and brother-in-law of the Harper boys—and there Dr. Guernsey has been ever since. He is a careful, plodding, impartial man, and, at present, edits the weekly newspaper of the same concern. No articles are written to order for the Harpers; nor have they standing engagements with any writers, but buy article by article as they are handed in by Bohemians and others. Five dollars a page is paid in the Magazine for contributions, and five dollars a column in the Weekly. The only contributor who could sell anything that he penned to Harper, was the wild, gifted, unfortunate Fitz James O'Brien. His story of the "Diamond Lens" was some time ago denounced by an envious rival as a plagiarism from Edgar A. Poe, but the public properly treated the story as a canard of the purest water.

The Leader of this city, has been so well thought of, that a Sunday journal of the same name has been started in Boston. It is a wonder to me that Chicago has not some such literary organ; for at present the Northwest is entirely destitute of either a review or a story and sketch paper. In Portland, Maine, a new magazine has been issued, called the Northern Monthly, but it cannot afford to buy good papers—no more than the Continental or the Knickerbocker, (now the American Magazine.) John Bonifer, who formerly edited Harpers' Weekly and wrote the Herald's money article, has grown rich by stock speculations and retired, like his predecessor on the Herald, Edward Hudson, brother of Frederick Hudson, managing editor. Edward made a nice thing from the non-descript "Potosi Silver Mines."

The publishers are doing nothing on their own account; all the new books you see are either reprints, or are published at the expense of their authors. Carleton engrosses the mass of these safe speculations. He is now getting out a book of poems for Robert H. Newell, ("Orpheus C. Kerr,") called The Palace Beautiful, and will soon start a magazine to be called The Heart of the Monthlies. Why didn't he denominate it the "Pink of the Posies?" Among the most persistent of small authors is Henry G. Morford, editor of a small weekly here. Morford gets $15 a week for editing this concern, and having a large family, lays about him very creditably, to make more money. He published some years ago a book called Rhymes of Twenty Years, so unmitigatedly bad that nobody in the country could notice it well, except old Dr. Shelton Mackenzie, to whom Morford dedicated a novel. However, Morford took to prose fiction, for which, although a bustling, clever fellow, he had no capacities, and has produced two or three strange volumes, called, respectively, The Days of Shoddy, Shoulder Straps, and The Coward. All of these were put forth by Peterson of Philadelphia; the first of these was simply a series of advertisements, rented out at a hundred dollars a page. I admire Morford's business energy, but must assure him that he is a decidedly bad literary man. Do you know anybody who has read his book? If so, present said patron with a copy of Webster at my expense, and I dare say he will find the dictionary very sprightly.

The only other author who publishes to advantage for himself is Bayard Taylor. Since the failure of the Putnams, Bayard has gone into the trade for himself, and, having live Quaker wit, makes it pay. He has the use of Ticknor & Fields' name for his poems. A new firm here—Hurd & Houghton—is doing a good thing. Their latest book, which lies upon my table wet from the press, (Idyls of the Battle), is the best collection of war poems we have had. Its authoress is Miss Laura C. Redden, ("Howard Glyndon,") of Washington city; in issuing the book she received material assistance from President Lincoln, General Grant and other great guns. This lady's poems are the softest and most pathetic of the crisis, as far above the vapors of George H. Boker as one of Tennyson's idyls surpasses one of Augustine Duganne's spluttering songs. I do not wish to give high praise without fair evidence, and, if you will let me, propose to quote some stanzas from this volume. Excepting the abrupt ending of the fourth line, this is a good beginning:

"Oh! my darling, my darling, never to feel
Your hand going over my hair—
Never to lie in your arms again,
Never to know where you are."

How sinewy is the subjoined stanza:

"Show them how a brief defeat
Hath its uses, pure and sweet—
How it fires the brain, the soul, with newer heat!
Failure's lowest depths we sound,
Then, with terrible rebound,
Up the heights of triumph go our conquering feet."

Is not the following complete poem worthy a great name:

O wistful eyes! that will not cease
From gazing, sadly after one

Who went out in the dark alone,
Although ye say he is at peace.
O hearts! that will not turn away,
But, questioning, stand without the door;
He passeth through it nevermore,
For he hath reached the perfect day.

Even when we thought him most our own
His crown was nearest to his brow,
And he redeemed his early vow,
And passed with all his armor on.

His guin exceedeth all our loss,
We linger on these barren sands,
He is a dweller in the lands
Bequeathed the Soldiers of the Cross!

Miss Redden's poem of the "Latest War News" is probably the finest short piece written during the struggle. When George Alfred Townsend was writing for the London serials last year, he quoted this poem in Chambers' Edinburgh Journal, and it became so popular with John Bull that it travelled through his entire periodical press.

Let me tell you a sly secret. You have heard of the Tribune's lyric:

"Tear down the flaunting lie?"

Well, that was written by Charles G. Halpin, better known as "Corporal Miles O'Reilly," the author of Tropical Poems, of many of the best things in Harper's Weekly, and now of the Democratic campaign songs in the World newspaper. Halpin is the best and most unscrupulous young poet in the East. He has written a volume of splendid things on both sides, and will give you a song for Lincoln quite as vigorous as one for McClellan. He stauds highly as a current metrical political writer, but beneath the veriest ballad-monger in point of principle. He could be, at the same time, poet-laureate to Jeff. Davis and the champion lyricist of the Union. Halpin has been nominated for a small political office in this city by the Wood (separation) Democracy.

Halpin and Miss Redden, to my mind, take precedence of all other balladists of the war. But of the war I shall speak again, when the next mail from this side of the continent turns up in San Francisco. Artemus Ward says that the distance between Pacific and Atlantic civilization is two thousand miles, and that, to break the monotony of the journey, the great Pacific railway has been finished over twelve miles of the route.

Yours truly,

DESULTORY.

A DAUGHTER OF G. P. R. JAMES.—It may not be generally known that Miss Florence James, daughter of the late eminent novelist, G. P. R. James, has been for some months a resident of this city and a contributor to THE CALIFORNIAN. The signature will be recognized in "The Fall of a Republic," an original paper which appears in this number. Miss James is at present an assistant in the "Kindergarten" school of Prof. Miel.

A CHANGE has occurred in the office of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, Capt. Eldridge, who arrived in the Golden City, taking the place formerly occupied at this port by A. B. Forbes as agent. Capt. Eldridge has been in the Government employ during much of the war, and has rendered faithful and efficient service, winning encomiums alike from the Admirals and Generals with whom his duties brought him in contact. The only drawback to the pleasure with which Capt. Eldridge will be received in his new office, is the regret which will be felt by the public in parting with Mr. Forbes, a gentleman who, in the administration of his office as well as in his private-citizen life, has won himself many and warm friends.

THE steamer Golden City, on Wednesday, brought back Mr. William R. Garrison to these shores. Mr. Garrison's many friends—and they are only bounded by the list of his acquaintances—will hail his return with pleasure. It was probably owing to Mr. Garrison's absence that the Club House at San Mateo was burned down, and that things about town have gone wrong generally. That all will be set to rights now may be accepted as a foregone conclusion.

THE public will be glad to learn that Mrs. Sophie Edwin returns to the stage on Monday evening in Little Barefoot. Mrs. Edwin is a disciple of the legitimate drama, and in her hands we have no apprehension that the piece will be turned from a Little Barefoot into a Big Bareleg. On the same evening Harry Courtaine reappears at the Opera House.

THE Philadelphia Press denies to the late Capt. Speke the merit of having discovered the source of the Nile. It says: "He ascertained that the Nile flowed out of a lake, but the principal affluent feeding that lake is to be accepted as the Nile's real source, and is yet to be discovered."

ONE C. P. Bodfish, of Boise City, has been appointed Assessor of Internal Revenue for Idaho Territory. He will be fortunate indeed if half the business letters received by him are not addressed by an inadvertant transposition to B. P. Codfish.

THE LOVE-KNOT.

["NORAH PERRY," author of this breezy little poem, which first appeared in the New York Home Journal some years ago, is now a resident of this city. Norah seems to have forsaken the pen for the pencil, being engaged in painting miniatures:]

TYING her bonnet under her chin,
She tied her raven ringlets in,
But not alone in the silken snare
Did she catch her lovely floating hair,
For tying her bonnet under her chin,
She tied a young man's heart within.

They were strolling together up the hill,
Where the wind comes blowing merry und chill,
And it blew the curls a frolicsome race
All over the happy, peach-colored face,
Till, scolding and laughing, she tied them in Under her beautiful, dimpled chin.

And it blew a color, bright as the bloom
Of the pinkest fuchsia's tossing plume,
All over the cheeks of the prettiest girl
That ever imprisoned a rumping curl,
Or in tying her bonnet under her chin,
Tied a young man's heart within.

Steeper and steeper grew the hill—
Madder, merrier, chillier still.
The western wind blew down and played
The wildest tricks with the little maid—
As, tying her bonnet under her chin,
She tied a young man's heart within.

O Western Wind, do you think it was fair
To play such tricks with her floating hair?
To gladly, gleefully, do your best
To blow her against the young man's breast,
When he as gladly folded her in
And kissed her mouth and dimpled chin.

O Ellery Vane! you little thought,
An hour ago, when you besought
This country lass to walk with you,
After the sun had dried the dew,
What perils danger you'd be in,
As she tied her bonnet under her chin.

MANUFACTURED PICTURES.

MR. WINSTANLEY, of Liverpool, in the course of a lecture on portrait painting, delivered by him at the Royal Institution of that town, some years ago, related an anecdote which may enlighten as well as interest the patrons of old pictures. The high character of Mr. Winstanley secures him from the suspicion that he has at all exaggerated the statement; but we believe there are many persons who could relate stories equally striking and equally true. It is notorious that in England there are hundreds of Titians, Vandykes and Raphaels, the canvas for which was manufactured in the nineteenth century; the imposition practised upon English buyers on the continent are so notorious as to have become proverbial; and of the eight thousand works by foreign masters annually imported into this country, perhaps it would not be too much to say, ninety-nine out of every hundred are forgeries. Yet noblemen and gentlemen will be cheated with their eyes open, and very frequently crowd their rooms with base imitations, when, for half the sum they might have procured good and true works by accomplished artists, and at the same time have had the proud and happy knowledge that they had contributed to advance the glory of their country, and the interest of its men of genius. We quote the anecdote related by Mr. Winstanley, as one of the most circumstantial and best authenticated that has ever been recorded: He exhibited to the audience a small picture, which from the peculiar costume, the cut of the beard, and the expanse of forehead, looked like a portrait of Shakspeare. It was also finished in a style, and had an appearance of age and mellowness, that would incline almost any person to believe it a genuine picture. Some years ago, a friend in London wrote to him giving information that he had picked up from some noteless vender of heterogeneous articles, a portrait of Shakspeare, an undoubted original. Mr. Winstanley saw the picture, approved of it, and became its proprietor. It was the identical picture which was then before the audience. He showed it to several persons of eminent taste, who all pronounced it an original picture, and set upon it a high value, though they attributed it to different masters. He was offered very large sums of money for it, which, however, he refused, on the very proper principle, that if it were an original portrait of Shakspeare, such a rarity was inestimable, and if it were not, he had no right to take any such amount for it as was tendered. To set the matter at rest, he took the picture to London, where he called upon an individual whom he found repairing a portrait of Nell Gwynne. This person informed him, in his peculiar way, that he had made many portraits of Shakspeare, and he had no doubt he could tell him something respecting the one in question. The moment the picture was placed before him, he said, "Oh, that is my old friend!" On being pressed for an explanation, he said that it had been made by a pupil of his—a person whom he had taught to manufacture portraits of Shakspeare. It was one of a pair of old pictures of an ancient gentleman and lady of the Elizabethan age. From the costume and features they thought it might be made to look like Shakspeare. Accordingly, under his direction his pupil heightened the forehead, altered the hair and beard, and put in a few touches, which made the old man into a Shakspeare. This sort of deception Mr. Winstanley assured the assembly had not been uncommon; and thus a picture for which he might have had five hundred guineas turned out to be worthless.—Art Union.

CONSCIENCE.—Locke has demonstrated that we have neither innate ideas nor innate principles, and he was obliged to demonstrate it too much at length, because at the time the contrary was universally believed. From hence it evidently follows that we have the utmost possible necessity that good principles should be lodged in our heads, when we come to use the faculty of understanding. Locke cites the example of savages who kill and eat their neighbors without the slightest remorse of conscience, and of well-educated Christian soldiers, who, in a town taken by assault, pillage, slay, and ravish, not only without remorse, but with the utmost pleasure, with honor and glory, with the applause of all their comrades. It results from all this, that we have no other conscience than that with which we are inspired by time, by example, by our temperament, and by our reflections. Man is not born with any principle, but with the faculty of receiving all. His temperament will render him inclined to cruelty or to kindness; his understanding will, in time, enable him to comprehend that the square of twelve is one hundred and forty-four, that he ought not to do to others that which he does not wish to be done to himself; but he will not of himself comprehend these truths in his infancy—he will not understand the first, and he will not feel the second.

A young savage who is hungry, and to whom his father shall give a slice of another savage to eat, will require the same the next day, without imagining that he ought not to treat his neighbor otherwise than he would wish to be treated himself. He does mechanically, invincibly, exactly, the reverse of what this eternal truth teaches. Nature has provided for this horror. She has given to man the disposition to pity, and the ability to comprehend the truth. These two gifts of God are the foundations of civilized society. They have caused that there should be so few anthropophagi, they have rendered life somewhat tolerable in civilized countries. Fathers and mothers give their children an education which soon renders them sociable, and that education gives them conscience.

Pure religion and pure morality imparted at an early age, so form human nature, that from about seven years of age till sixteen or seventeen, no bad action is committed without the reproof of conscience. Then succeed the violent passions which combat the conscience, and sometimes extinguish it. During this conflict, the persons tormented by the storm consult on some occasions with other men, as in their sickness they consult those who appear to be in health. It is this which produces casuists—that is, persons who decide cases of conscience. One of the wisest of casuists is Cicero. In his book Officiis—that is, on the Duties of Man—he examines the most delicate points, but long before him Zoroaster had appeared to regulate the conscience by the best of precepts—"Being in doubt whether an action be good or bad, abstain from it."

TROPICAL DELIGHTS.—Insects are the curse of tropical climates. The heta rouge lays the foundation of a tremendous ulcer. In a moment you are covered with ticks. Chigoes bury themselves in your flesh, and hatch a large colony of young chigoes in a few hours. They will not live together, but every chigoe sets up a separate ulcer, and has his own private portion of pus. Flies get entry into your mouth, into your eyes, into your nose; you eat flies, drink flies, and breathe flies. Lizards, cockroaches, and snakes, get into the bed; ants eat up the books; scorpions sting you on the foot. Every thing bites, stings, or bruises; every second of your existence you are wounded by some piece of animal life that nobody has ever seen before, except Swammerdam and Meriam. An insect with eleven legs is swimming in your tea-cup, a nondescript with nine wings is struggling in the small beer, or a caterpillar with several dozen eyes in his belly is hastening over the bread and butter! All nature is alive, and seems to be gathering all her entomological hosts to eat you up, as you are standing, out of your coat, waistcoat, and breeches. Such are the tropics. All this reconciles us to our dews, fogs, vapors, and drizzle—to our apothecaries rushing about with gargles and tinctures—to our old, British constitutional coughs, sore throats, and swelled faces.—Sydney Smith.

A HABIT IN THE ENGLISH MIND.—There is a decided tendency in the English mind to ask what may be the consequences of a proposition, before inquiring into its validity; as if it were possible, by a bare act of human volition, to make that which is, a nonentity—or that which is not, a reality. In the instance of geology, the habit (for it is but a habit) has been productive of the most mischievous results, and has covered some very worthy and respectable writers with a ridicule, which has reflected on the national character in the eyes of scientific Europe.

EPIGRAMIANA.

The following lines were written on seeing a farrago of rhymes that had been scribbled with a diamond on the window of an inn:

"Ye who on windows thus prolong your shames,
And to such arrant nonsense sign your names,
The diamond quit—with me the pencil take,
So shall your shame but short duration make;
For lo, the housemaid comes, in dreadful pet,
With red right hand, and with a discolored wet,
Dashes out all, nor leaves a wreck to tell
Who 'twas that wrote so ill, and lov'd so well!"

The following verses were written on a window in the highlands of Scotland:

Scotland! thy weather's like a modish wife,
Thy winds and rains forever are at strife;
So tergitant awhile her thunder tries,
And when she can no longer scold, she cries.

On a stone thrown at a very great man, but which missed him:

Talk no more of the lucky escape of the head
From a flint so unluckily thrown;
I think very different, with thousands indeed,
'Twas a lucky escape for the stone!

On the column to the Duke of York's memory:

In former times the illustrious dead were burned,
Their hearts preserved in sepulchre inurned;
This column, then, commemorates the part
Which custom makes us single out—the heart;
You ask: "How by a column this is done?"
I answer: "'Tis a hollow thing of stone."

ROGERS, when a certain M. P., in a review of his poems, said "he wrote very well for a banker," wrote, in return, the following:

"They say he has no heart, but I deny it,
He has a heart—and gets his speeches by it!"

You say, without reward or fee,
Your uncle cured me of a dangerous ill;
I say he never did prescribe for me,
The proof is plain—I'm living still!

THE speeches made by P—are sound,
It cannot be denied;
Granted; and then it will be found,
They're little else beside.

CITY LOVE.

In making love let poor men sigh,
But love that's ready-made is better
For men of business—so I,
If madam will be cruel, let her.
But should she wish that I should wait
And miss the 'Change—oh no, I thank her,
I court by deed, or after date,
Through my solicitor or banker.

ON A NEW DUKE.

Ask you why gold and velvet bind
The temples of that eringing thief?
Is it so strange a thing to find
A toad beneath a strawberry leaf?

A GOOD WORD FOR MINISTERS.

THE Whigs 'tis said have often broke
Their promises which end in smoke;
Thus their defence I build:
Granted in office they have slept,
Yet sure those promises are kept
Which never are fulfilled.

SAYS his landlord to Thomas: "Your rent I must raise,

I'm so plaguily pinch'd for the pelf"
"Raise my rent!" replies Thomas; "your honor's main good;
For I never can raise it myself."

A CERTAIN bishop having lost his portmanteau, the circumstance gave rise to the following:

"I have lost my portmanteau"—
"I pity your grief,"
"It contained all my sermons"—
"I pity the thief."

THE house of Mr. Dundas, late President of the Court of Session in Scotland, having after his death been converted into a blacksmith's shop, a gentleman wrote upon its door the following impromptu:

"The house a lawyer once enjoy'd,
Now to a smith doth pass;
How naturally the iron age
Succeeds the age of brass!"

A QUERY ANSWERED.

"WHY, pray, of late do Europe's kings
No jester to their courts admit?"
"They're grown such stately solemn things,
To bear a joke they think not fit.
But though each court a jester lacks,
To laugh at monarchs to their faces,
Yet all mankind, behind their backs,
Supply the honest jesters' places."

BURDELL'S

Oriental Tooth Wash.

SOUND AND WHITE TEETH

Are Indispensable to Personal Attraction, and to Health and Longevity, by proper mastication of the food.

THIS UNIQUE PREPARATION IS OF INESTIMABLE value in preserving and beautifying the Teeth, strengthening the Gums, and in imparting a delicate fragrance to the breath. It eradicates tartar from the Teeth, removes spots of incipient decay, and polishes and preserves the enamel, to which it imparts a PEARL-LIKE WHITENESS.

Its anti-septic and anti-scorbutic properties exercises a highly beneficial and salutary influence; they arrest the further progress of the decay of Teeth, induce a healthy action of the Gums, and cause them to assume the brightness and color indicative of perfect soundness; while, by confirming their adhesion to the Teeth, they give unlimited enjoyment: and fresh zest to appetite, by perpetuating effective and complete mastication. It speedily removes those ravages which children sustain in the teeth, owing to the improper use of sweet and acid substances.

THE BACHELOR'S DREAM EXPLAINED.

I think you remember that some months ago,
I was courting a handsome young girl;
Since then I went travelling up country, you know,
And I've now lost the run of my Belle.

I loved her so dearly—I do love her yet,
Of course she must know very well;
Indeed, I am ready to go in a fit
Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

I've made an inquiry of all the young chaps—
Been searching at every hotel;
I've now and then called on old Schiedam Schnapps
Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

Kept running all day like a fool in the street,
To search for another young girl;
And every fine lady I chance for to meet,
I've inquired for my old lover, Belle.

I start for a Photographic Gallery,
To look for my sweet little Belle;
And who in the name you think I should see?
A face of that very same girl!

I then said, "Dear Belle, I've caught you at last;
Are you lying, or here in disguise?"
And what do you think, my friends, it was?
A picture of her in life size.

Now to be seen at H. BUSH'S Gallery, corner of Post,

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS.

OWING to the vague nature of our telegrams, this week's summary is little more than a concentration of indefiniteness. Sherman still continues to excite consternation among the Confederates, who, in spite of all their whistling, can scarcely keep their courage up sufficiently to inspire in them a faint hope of their ability to prevent his safely reaching the Atlantic seaboard. Indeed, a late despatch states that news received from Southern sources leaves no room to doubt that he has already reached that goal. Granting this, and the closing month of the year seems destined to be fraught with historic material. It can scarcely fail to witness some startling result—perhaps the fall of Richmond. The event of this week has been the battle of Franklin, Tenn., a bloody episode in the history of the war but a glorious victory for the Union arms. Hood's army met a portion of Thomas's forces, and victory perched upon the eagles of the latter. Hood, however, is gathering his strength and closing around Nashville. But we are assured that Thomas is safe and prepared for the encounter. Other news of interest will be found condensed in the following "record":

November 28.—Hood assaults the works at Columbia, south of Duck river, and is repulsed.

A despatch from Western Virginia states that the rebels under Gen. Payne captured and burned New Creek, on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. A force of 300 was sent to Piedmont, but they were met by a company of the 6th West Virginia Regiment, and repulsed.

November 29.—Sherman's movements still a mystery to the Southern Confederacy. The Richmond Despatch of the 23th, says it was pretty well ascertained that the left wing of Sherman's army, when it reached Madison, numbered sixteen thousand. They burned the town when they left. The Augusta papers say great excitement prevailed in that city a week ago. In consequence of the very great and urgent need for troops, it was proposed to impress the negroes. One paper of that place was fearful of treachery on the part of citizens on Sherman's arrival.

November 30.—The rebels attempt to destroy the position of Grant's line on the James by damming the stream, but the waters were thrown back through a bend on a portion of the rebel line, and threatened serious damage.

Lee building a railroad for the accommodation of cavalry.

Richmond papers speak nervously of Grant's movements, and predict another advance upon the rebel capital. The Despatch favors the appointment of Gen. Lee as Military Adviser to Congress.

A fight occurred on the Oconee River, near Milledgeville, between the rebels and a portion of Sherman's forces; the attack was intended to prevent the advance crossing the river, but failed.

The Columbia Guardian says: "There are 4,000 deserters from the rebel army in South Carolina." It is reported that a wide-spread conspiracy exists in the South to overthrow the Richmond dynasty. Considerable consternation was created by important arrests made in North Carolina, Upper South Carolina, Georgia and Virginia.

The Richmond Enquirer gives an account of a serious attempt by the Federal prisoners confined at Salisbury, N. C., to make their escape. A plot, it seems, was formed among the prisoners, numbering some 12,000, to overpower the guards and, after securing arms for themselves, to march into Tennessee through West North Carolina, and thus effect their freedom. By the precautions of the rebel guards the prisoners were overpowered, and the attempt was foiled. About forty are stated to have been killed and several wounded.

Gen. A. L. Lee, commanding the Union forces at Baton Rouge, La., had engagements with the enemy at Liberty and Brookville on the 22d, in which he was entirely successful. He captured three pieces of cannon, about 800 mules and horses, and 200 prisoners, besides destroying an immense amount of army stores on the railroad. The staff of Gen. Hodge, including Lieut. Davis, (a nephew of Jeff.) are among the prisoners. Hodge himself escaped capture by jumping from a back window.

December 1.—The battle of Franklin, (Tenn.) one of the most brilliant of the war, was fought on the 30th November. Skirmishing had been kept up for three days during the retirement of the Federal army from Duck river to Franklin. The rebels, under the command of Hood, greatly outnumbered the Union forces. Parties who witnessed the battle describe the attack of the rebels as desperate in the extreme. Some assert that eleven charges were made on the Federal masked batteries, in a body four lines deep, while a correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette states that seventeen distinct assaults were made, each of which was repulsed. The same correspondent, writing from the scene of the conflict, gives the following account of the affair: "The original plan was to withdraw the force of Schofield until meeting our reinforcements, and give battle in the vicinity of Nashville; but the over-sanguine rebels pressed us too hard, and when Schofield perceived that he could not avoid the contest he drew up his little army in line of battle, with his front towards Franklin. At half-past 3 o'clock the rebel assault commenced. Cheatham's corps was on the right; Stewart's on the left; S. D. Lee's corps was in reserve on the centre. Cheatham threw his whole corps on Wagner's Division with great impetuosity, and after half an hour's desperate fighting, pushed Wagner back on the second line, where they became mixed with Rogers's men, on our left centre. The rebels, encouraged by the success of driving Wagner back, advanced with loud cheers on our strong line. Cox's and Wagner's men were broken but a moment before they rallied and attacked the enemy on the flank, while Opdike charged them in front. A desperate hand-to-hand fight ensued, with bayonets and butt-ends of muskets. Some of the rebels were captured here, and the line restored. For two hours and a half the battle raged all along the lines. The assaulting columns were six regiments deep. Capt. Lyman, commanding the artillery brigade of the Fourth Corps, had placed his batteries in a favorable position, and from these storms of shot and shell were hurled into the charging ranks. With the most reckless bravery the rebels rushed on. Riley's brigade of the Twenty-third Corps covered the ground in front of it with rebel dead. Seventeen distinct attacks of the foe were repulsed. At dusk the rebels were repulsed at all points, but the firing did not stop until 9 o'clock. At least 6,000 rebels were killed, wounded and captured. Our loss will reach 1,500. We have taken from the enemy 30 flags." The night after the battle, Gen. Thomas retired from Franklin, taking a position and formed a line of battle about three miles south of Nashville. 107 rebel officers, including a Brigadier-General and several Colonels, with 1,000 prisoners, arrived at Nashville, December 1st.

Gen. Meade telegraphs to Grant that Gen. Gregg, who was sent on a reconnaissance to discover if the enemy were removing troops south, had taken Stony Creek Station. He captured two pieces of artillery, but had no means of bringing them off, so he spiked them and destroyed the carriages. He took 190 prisoners, 8 wagons and 30 mules. He also destroyed the railroad bridge, about 150 feet long, 5,000 sacks of grain, 500 bales of hay, a quantity of corn and oats, 500 barrels coal oil, a quantity of bacon, the camp and garrison equipage, besides 1,200 Enfield rifles and a large quantity of ammunition.

December 3.—Official information received that Sherman captured Millen, on the Georgia Central Railroad, on the 29th ult. His army was concentrated and expected to move at once upon Savannah.

A movement of an unknown character took place at Butler's headquarters, according to the World's army correspondent. The regular troops there had been ordered away on an expedition and sailed for Port Royal.

Gov. Vance, in his message to the North Carolina Legislature, states that the laws cannot be enforced in the interior of that State, owing to the existence of a band of desperadoes, consisting of rebel deserters. He recommends the outlawing and driving them from the State.

Gen. Merritt, with a force of cavalry, completely routed the guerrillas from Loudon county, Va., destroying everything that could be of service to them.

December 4.—Savannah and other Georgia papers make various statements regarding Sherman's movements. They all unite in the assertion that he is "marching on."

Gov. Brown was in Macon: he removed all valuables from Milledgeville. The rebel cavalry burned barns, corn cribs, and everything that could be of use to Sherman.

A despatch of the 24th states that the Union troops fought unsuccessfully for the possession of Oconee Bridge. Another says that the Federals flanked Gen. Wayne on the Central Railroad, compelling him to retire; they also crossed the river at Ball's Ferry, 4 miles below the bridge. Still another asserts that our troops were driven across the Oconee. The main body of Sherman's army was 13 miles west of Sandersville, going towards Savannah, and spreading devastation everywhere.

Gen. Foster proceeds up the Broad river, landing five miles below the Pocotaligo bridge. He captures the bridge and destroys a large amount of stores found in the vicinity.

Admiral Dahlgren and Gen. Foster are in communication with Sherman, who is supposed to be marching on Savannah.

The Richmond Despatch of the 2d instant says: "A cavalry fight, in which we were victorious, took place in East Georgia, on Tuesday. The Yankee cavalry, under Kilpatrick, were attempting to cross the Savannah river, when they were attacked by Wheeler, and, after an obstinate fight, driven back in the direction of Millen, losing very heavily. Sherman's main army is moving toward the coast. A battle is expected."

And the Richmond Whig gives this information: "An official despatch was received last night that our forces routed the Yankees at Grahamville, South Carolina, driving them five miles. The Yankees left their dead on the field. Grahamville is on the road from Savannah to Charleston, about thirty miles northeast from Savannah. The party were evidently the troops sent up from Port Royal."

INTERIOR ITEMS.

The Savage, Chollar and Hale & Norcross mines have suspended operations for the present. The two former have their ore-houses full; the latter stops work on account of the accumulation of snow on the premises.

At Iowa Flat, Cal., a few days since, Joseph Potect struck Jacob Lout with the edge of a shovel, cutting a deep gash in his forehead. A dispute relative to a mining claim led to the encounter. Lout's recovery is doubtful. Potect was arrested.

Two men named John McMahon and Frank Jefferson were killed, and another named Colby badly bruised, by a caving in of dirt in the American claim at Chile Gulch, Cal., Dec. 1st.

A little daughter of S. M. Hitchcock who resides near Santa Rosa, (says the Sonoma Democrat), while playing with a quill-whistle, got it into her windpipe. Surgeons are unable to remove the quill, and the child's condition is precarious.

Judge De la Guerra, says the Wilmington Star, has decided that greenbacks are a legal tender in payment of debts contracted before Congress passed the Act authorizing their issuance. Judge McKune, of the Fourth District Court, has rendered a similar decision.

The Senator brought from San Pedro to this city, during the past month, 7,500 sacks of corn. Pretty good export for a "starved-out" locality.

Recently the cabin of O. A. Beeler, near West Point, was robbed of flour, clothing, etc., valued at about $100.

A huge California lion paid a visit, lately, to James Danly, of Warm Springs, Nevada. Danly immediately took a position on the roof of his domicile, and the uninvited guest reared himself on a quarter of beef which hung against the wall.

The body of a man named Smith was found recently, near Angels, Cal., under circumstances which left no doubt that he had been murdered.

Capt. J. E. Carnes, while out rabbit-shooting, near Silver City, fell into a shaft which the snow had concealed, and was killed. Carnes was a pioneer, and in both California and Nevada was highly respected.

The house of a man named Garity, at Iowa Hill, was entered, recently, and robbed of coin and jewelry. Two colored men have been arrested, and a portion of the stolen property found in possession of one of them.

A piece of petrified honey-comb has been found sixteen feet below the surface in a mining claim on Greenhorn creek, Cal.

LOCAL MATTERS OF THE WEEK.

Supervisor McCoppin last week tendered his resignation to the Board in consequence of their action in the matter of the Pacific Railroad bonds. A number of the heaviest tax-payers in his district signed a card requesting him to remain in the Board to guard their interests, and subsequently the Board unanimously passed a resolution requesting him to withdraw his resignation. So Mr. McCoppin still continues at his post.

The first number of the California Youth's Companion made its appearance last Saturday. It is a non-sectarian family journal, devoted to the advancement of the youth of our city, and is to be published weekly, by Messrs. Smith & Edgar. This number contains a handsome engraving of the new Grammar School on Bush street. The proprietors deserve success.

The body of Edward McCall, a native of Canada, was found hanging from a tree near the Six-mile House, on Saturday last. It was probably a case of suicide.

The annual election for Third Assistant Engineer of the Fire Department, took place last Monday, and resulted in favor of Thomas Finnerty, of Washington House No. 1.

A new steamship to be called Del Norte, is being built at Hunter's Point by Capt. Owens. It is intended to run her between San Francisco and Humboldt. She will be launched on the 13th inst.

Frederick D. Kohler, a pioneer San Franciscan, and at one time Chief Engineer of the Fire Department, died in this city last Tuesday. His remains were followed to the grave by the Pioneer Association and a large delegation of the Fire Department.

Judge Sheppard sentenced a Chinaman to pay $100 or go to the County Jail for forty days, for borrowing an umbrella without the consent of its owner.

Frank Rivers, the forger of Paymasters' checks, whose financial operations we recorded last week, has been held for trial before the County Court on two charges, his bail being fixed at $2,000 in each case.

The valuation of church property in this city is estimated to be as follows: Protestant, $327,320; Catholic, including colleges, $592,075.

The fall of rain this season, up to Friday morning, amounts to about eight inches.

The Monitor Camanche is nearly ready for action.

The Grand Ball of the Fire Department, which was advertised to take place on the 8th, has been postponed to Thursday evening, 29th inst., in consequence of the death of ex-Chief Engineer Kohler.

DR. LIBBEY, a gentleman of many years practice in the Dental profession, a capable and proficient Dentist, has recently opened a fine suite of rooms directly opposite the main entrance of the Russ House, on Montgomery street. We direct public attention to his card, elsewhere.

J. R. MEAD & Co's.—Received ex steamer Constitution a large invoice of clothing, consisting of new style cape overcoats, cashmere and dress vests, Beaver suits, Business suits, Robe de chambrés, etc. J. R. M. & Co. pride themselves on the make and finish of their imported clothing, and can dress a gentleman a la mode in the most unexceptionable manner.

RUPTURE.—We call attention to the advertisement of Professor A. FOLLEAU, Pupil of Charrière of Paris, Surgical Mechanist of the French Benevolent Society, who has made the Treatment of all Deformities of the Body, and the construction and application of peculiar surgical instruments for the treatment of Rupture, Spinal Complaints, sores for club feet, etc.; and the construction of Artificial Legs, Arms, Crutches, etc. Prof. Folleau's office is 624 Washington street, between Montgomery and Kearny streets. IMPORTANT DECISION.—Everybody is going to buy HOLIDAY PRESENTS, at extremely low prices, at FELDBUSH & CO's, because they have the largest assortment and most magnificent display of FANCY GOODS AND TOYS ever seen in any part of the world, which are now being unpacked and offered for sale at wholesale, at No. 531 Washington street, and retail at No. 207 Montgomery street, in Russ House Block, San Francisco.

KOHLER'S GREAT SALE OF RICH HOLIDAY GOODS.—Platt's Hall is to be transformed into a Bazaar on Wednesday and Thursday next, for the exhibition and sale of Kohler's immense stock of recently imported fine French and European fancy articles, which have arrived too late for the whole sale demand. The display of rich and elegant Fancy articles, Bohemian Ware, Vases, Flacons, Liqueur and Toilet sets, Statuary, Paintings, Toilet and Lace Boxes, Plated-ware, Ornaments, etc., will excel any similar exhibit ever offered to the San Francisco public. Messrs. Cobb & Sinton will act as Auctioneers. The sale is announced in our advertising columns.

GLORIOUS NEWS.—Six pounds White Granulated Sugar, $1; nine pounds Cooking Sugar, $1; seven pounds Cooking Raisins, $1; six-pound boxes Raisins, $1; six pounds Currants, $1; eight pounds new Dried Apples, $1; seven pounds Prunes, $1; seven pounds California Dried Peaches, $1; four pounds Green Coffee, $1; nine pounds Rice, $1. Teas—Oolong, 75 cents per pound; Family Mixture, 75 cents; Mandarin Oolong, $1; strong and fine-flavored Breakfast Tea, $1; new crop Japan Tea, 90 cents; very choice Green Teas, $1. Fresh Ground Coffee, for family use, 35 cents; Bahbitt's pure Cream Tartar, 60 cents; Saleratus, 12 cents; Preston & Merrill's Yeast Powder, 25 cents per box; McMurray's Oysters, 40 cents; and numerous other articles cheap for cash, at HASKELL'S NEW MAMMOTH TEA STORE, fronting on Market and Sutter streets, three doors below the Metropolitan Market. Open every evening till further notice.

SOMETHING INTERESTING.—The following list comprises the best articles of their kind in use:

Nelson's Extract of Roses and Rosemary;
Lawrence & Co's Patent Improved Flesh Gloves and Straps;
The Oxford Washing Pad;
Burdett's Oriental Tooth Wash;
Chevalier's Life for the Hair;
Quintessence of English Garden Lavender Flowers.

For particulars see advertising columns. These articles are prepared and sold by H. P. WAKELEE, Importer and Manufacturer, corner of Montgomery and Sutter streets, San Francisco.

WET AND DRY.—What a great propensity people have for imbibing "something" in rainy weather! How can one account for the paradoxical fact that the wetter they get the drier they are? We dropped into Squarza's yesterday afternoon, and from the discourse we found practicing at his bar, concluded that Signor Squarza was a great benefactor in these wet times, and that the compounds of his laboratory were more sought after than India-rubber overcoats and umbrellas.

MR. CHRETIEN PFISTER, No. 221 Montgomery street, under the Russ House, respectfully calls the attention of the public to his extensive assortment of Perfumery, Brushes, Hair-plas, Hair of all lengths and colors, Wigs, Toupes, Combs of every style; Cravats of all kinds; Jovian's Gloves for ladies and gentlemen; Suspenders, Shirts and Collars; new styles of Head Dresses, and all the latest Parisian accessories of the Lady's and Gentleman's toilet table. Having made new arrangements with his agent in Paris, he can now offer to his numerous customers superior advantages over any others in the trade. Six artist coiffeurs will always be found ready for business in the hair-dressing room. A special apartment is provided for the coiffure of ladies.

TO THE PUBLIC.—Go to the South Beach Bathing House, foot of Third street, near the Camanche, for comfort, pleasure or health; where can be found at all hours warm, cold, or shower Salt Water Baths. The water is taken through pipes extending over five hundred feet in the bay, and as pure as can be drawn from the ocean. The public have only to give this place a trial to satisfy themselves that this is the best fitted up Bathing House in this city—the North Beach House having blown up.

N. B.—The boiler and machinery are entirely separate from the Bathing House.

STACY, Proprietor.

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electro-pathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every namable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathize with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required! All letters answered with promptness and with pleasure, if directed to

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REDUCTION AND AMALGAMATION OF Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial Street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

As a guarantee of what this machine will do, I propose, with any gentleman who will produce an Amalgamator that will work the same amount of ore in the same number of hours, with the same outlay of power, and produce the equal result, to deposit the sum of FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS each, the money so deposited to be drawn by the person who shall be declared to have produced the best result. The money (the $500) by whichever party won to be paid over to some one of the benevolent institutions in this State, to be named by the party losing. This proposition is not made with the view of detracting from the merits of any Amalgamator now before the public, but for the purpose of placing this valuable improvement before such persons as may be interested in quartz milling, and to whom the matter properly belongs.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs. in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The millers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The millers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the millers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the millers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the millers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or millers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever.

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

THE MEDICAL FACULTY

May differ in relation to the treatment of disease, but there is very little diversity of opinion among them as to its origin. The philanthropist does not contend that any man becomes at once a

DRUNKARD OR A THIEF.

Nor does the well informed physician maintain that any one becomes at once an invalid. He knows that almost all diseases are of slow growth; that the seeds of disease are often sown at a remote period, and only await some change of climate or condition of the individual to manifest themselves.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. CATARRH!

Catarrh Remedy!

FOR CENTURIES CATARRH HAS DEFIED THE skill of physicians and surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. Nothing save DR. GOODALE'S REMEDY will break it up, radically destroying the principle of the disease, and precluding the possibility of a relapse. Medical men have attempted to explain what it is, but admit that they have not discovered its antidote. Dr. Goodale offers this simple definition of its character: It is a disorder which he DOES CURE and they DO NOT. This is the great fact which it imports the sufferer to know, and a single trial will establish it beyond a question. Price, $1. Sold by all Druggists.

THE GREAT UNEQUALLED
RESTORING, INVIGORATING, BEAUTIFYING

AND

Hair!

IT IS A STIMULATING, OILY EXTRACT OF BARKS and Herbs. It will cure all diseases of the scalp and itching of the head, entirely eradicates dandruff, prevents the Hair from falling out, or from turning prematurely gray, causing it to grow thick and long. It is entirely different, from all hair preparations, and may be relied on.

Put up in boxes containing two bottles—Price $1.

Sold by all Druggists.

NELSON'S EXTRACT OF Roses and Rosemary.

THE FOLLOWING IS A BRIEF NOTICE of some of its principal virtues, as a mild stimulative, corrective and preservative agent for the hair:

Infancy.—It insinuates its balsamic properties into the pores of the head, nourishes the hair in its embryonic state, accelerates its growth, sustains it in maturity, and continues the possession of healthy vigor, silky softness, and luxuriant redundancy, to the latest period of human life. Genial and purifying, it dispels all scurf and impurity, and renders the use of the fine comb unnecessary.

The Beard, Whiskers, and Mustachios.—Its extraordinary power in promoting the growth of the hair is singularly displayed in creating these ornaments of manhood.

Curl and Embellishment.—In dressing the hair nothing can equal its effect, rendering the hair so admirably soft that it will lie in any direction, producing beautifully flowing curls, and, by the transcendent lustre it imparts, rendering the coiffure inexpressibly attractive.

Grey Hair.—Its nourishing properties are eminently successful in the prevention of Grey Hair, and in numerous instances, in the restoration to its original color.

Baldness.—Its productive powers are constantly and surprisingly shown in cases of Baldness, so that in numerous instances where other specifics have been tried in vain, this celebrated Oil has effected a complete restoration of Beautiful Hair.

Sea-Bathing and Violent Exercise.—After indulging in either of these, so apt to exhaust the nourishing matter secreted at the roots or bulbs of the hair, the Roses and Rosemary will be found most efficacious, both in preserving and in immediately restoring the hair to its usual appearance of health with renovated brightness.

Its invaluable properties have obtained the patronage of every Court of the civilized world; and the high esteem in which it is universally held, together with numerous testimonials constantly received of its efficacy, affords the best and surest proofs of its merits.

Sold by all Druggists, and by H. P. WAKELEE, corner of Montgomery and Sutter streets, and corner of Bush and Montgomery streets. sc24

LAWRENCE & COMPANY'S

PATENT IMPROVED

Flesh Gloves and Straps!

For Producing a Healthy State of the System by Friction, Without the Risk of Tearing the Skin, as all the Ordinary Horse-Hair Gloves are liable to do.

THE GREAT VALUE OF THE HORSE-HAIR

Renovator as a therapeutic agent, when applied to the human body, is now too well known to every one who has paid the least attention to the importance of a healthy action of the Skin, to require further comment.

The superior advantages of the Patent Flesh Gloves and Straps, manufactured under this Patent, are that, by a peculiar process in the machinery employed in their manufacture, the points of the Hair are brought perpendicularly to the surface, thereby removing the liability to tear the Skin (a very general complaint against the ordinary kind,) rendering them more pleasant to use, at the same time enabling the process of friction to be much more effectually performed; they are, indeed, a positive luxury to use, apart from their salutary effects.

The peculiar fabric manufactured expressly for the use of Ladies deserves their special attention; it has been highly recommended by the most eminent of the medical profession, and given universal satisfaction to those who have used it.

THINGS.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, December 17, 1864.

RAIN has been so abundant during the past week, and Chinese umbrellas have come into such universal use, that Montgomery street has presented the appearance of an animated meadow, alive with peripatetic mushrooms.

The simile is an excellent one, because mushrooms always spring up after a shower, and it is well known that rain makes "mush" of the streets and room for the street cleaners to do their kindly offices.

There be people who regret the continuance of the rain, which has already lasted nearly forty days and forty nights, apprehensive of another deluge. Let it come. The world has not been well washed since the flood, and its Augean corners stand sadly in need of cleaning.

An ingenious Frenchman once assigned as a reason for not drinking water, that ever since the deluge it had a sad flavor of sinners. What a taste, then, would be lent to lakes and rivers by a submersion of the present population! I can mention six, who, soaked in the sea, would make it saltier than it now is by considerable.

Beyond the rain I have little to chronicle, if we except McCoppin's resignation and its subsequent withdrawal.

Why my friend resigned is a puzzle to me. I have seen him several times at the Board, when circumstances made it necessary for me to wait upon that body in an official capacity, and he always looked resigned enough then, without any further procedure. Besides, he had served a long time at the Board—though I believe he never was a time-server—and after having stood the Supervisors for five years I should have thought he might stand them for ten.

It cannot be denied that the Board of Supervisors is not a very cheerful place to spend all one's Monday evenings in, but there's nothing like getting used to a thing.

My own impression is, that he got mad and resigned because Stanford would not acknowledge the Market-street Railroad as a branch of the Pacific Railroad.

It was absurd to expect such a thing of Stanford, because we all know it is not his Mission.

The rains have done a good service for those who are accustomed to holiday-gifts, for had they not come, stockings might as well have been hung up on clothes lines as in chimney corners. Better, perhaps, for then they would have been out of the reach of the maliciously inclined.

I have some "feet" that I'd like to put in somebody else's stockings this year.

But the rains have filled purses as well as pans, and the holiday trade this year promises to be brisk.

HOLIDAY THINGS.

Yesterday I ventured to beard the Captain in his den and visited Tucker's old stand. A wagon-load of plate standing before the door convinced me that there is indeed a "vain for the silver"—as THE CALIFORNIAN's motto has it. Ten clerks were busy in packing up jewelry to go to the interior—to be worn on the exterior, however—and ten porters were running around with parcels for city delivery.

My purchases were light, owing to the fact that no one connected with the establishment was willing to take Wide West at its par value. But I looked at everything in the store and determined what I would have bought had my credit been good, so that perplexity was off my mind.

A large music box attracted my attention. Next to having a wife who plays the piano I fancy it would be a good thing to have that music-box in the house. In fact, I don't know but that this box is better, for it obviates the necessity of having a young music-master around. It never turns on music unless you set it a-going, and if you wish to stop it suddenly you can do so by throwing a boot at it—which you couldn't do to your wife.

So instead of a musical wife I think I'll get a music-box—the chances being less of getting into a bad-box than in the other event. "Playing" may be an accomplishment in a woman, but for steady house-keeping one that can work is better.

Roman has an assortment of books for the holidays to which I would call the public attention if he did not advertise them in another column—in the light of that fact people might think me partial.

But I cannot avoid remarking that he has got one of the best ordered and best fitted stores that I have ever seen in any city. Peculiarly adapted for holiday presents are some fine editions of English standard works, bound in half-calf, antique—a decided improvement, by the way, on the whole-ealf modern of late authors.

On gift-books, gorgeous as their binding and oriental as their style is, I don't go much generally, but among his stock I notice The Dusseldorf Gallery and Dore's Don Quixote. These works offer the ambitious young man of rich but respectable parents an opportunity for investment, so far as his Dulcinea is concerned, which like the pills and plasters of latter-day notoriety "cannot fail to produce the desired effect."

Of Children's books Roman's stock is large and varied, of picture books, especially; these are printed on cloth and cannot be well torn or destroyed unless previously chewed or soaked in the water-pitcher—a slow process which the infantile mind is too impatient to take. In addition to the books proper there are what may be denominated as book-toys, block-maps and such things, one in particular called The Magic Wheel. By this ingenious little contrivance and the aid of a mirror the child has dancing jacks and waltzing pelicans and skipping girls in infinite variety, the wonder of it being that they seem to be standing still one way and going the other when the converse of that proposition is the fact.

Dry goods men are not having a very lively time this year, a truth which is strikingly illustrated by the many announcements of "selling off."

The uncertainty of San Francisco trade is also shown by a fact which was demonstrated to me yesterday. Last year at this time there was not an evening dress to be had in town; the Russian Ball drained the last one and left a demand then. This year they can scarcely be given away, and the same with other costly and rare articles of the feminine wardrobe.

By the kindness of my friend Austin I was shown through the store of that firm of which Schmitt is the partner. I went through all its lanes and byeways, "up and down stairs" and everywhere but "in the lady's chamber," and discovered for the first time in my life that the establishment is a wholesale as well as a retail one, and that Schmitt is a man and not a myth, living among bales and cords of goods in the upper stories.

Had I been a woman I should have left the store distracted or never have left it at all. Such robes! There was one in particular, a cherry color with a trimming of what seemed point-lace around it, but which in reality was an imitation of lace in uncut velvet, woven into the silk.

I can imagine myself a woman, and in that dress, and a young man making propositions to support me, while I pointed to the robe which enveloped me, asking him if he could keep that gait going, and shaking its heavy folds and him if he replied in the negative. The house, on account of the large stock on hand, is selling out at cost, and if I remember rightly the cost of the robe in question was $250! A law ought to be lobbied through the Legislature by the Husband Protecting Union to suppress the exhibition of such things.

I also saw poplins—an excellent thing to be backed by when one "pops"—Irish poplins, so heavy that porters are required to carry the train; fur capes that reach the figure of $1,000; cashmere shawls, which require mere cash of the same amount to buy them; point lace sets of a point which I couldn't see were I a "provider," unless I owned a quartz-mill, besides other laces of which I shall not speak, my knowledge of the article going only to shoe-laces and stopping first short of stay-laces.

DRAMATIC MENTION.

Monday evening witnessed the re-appearance of Mrs. Edwin upon the stage of the Opera House and the commencement of an engagement by Mr. Courtaine, the piece of the occasion being Little Barefoot, succeeded by The Toddlekin.

Both Mrs. Edwin and Mr. Courtaine met with a warm reception at the hands of their many friends and admirers.

Little Barefoot is a companion-piece to Fanchon, and was written for Maggie Mitchell, I think; anyway, it is one of her famous characters. It is a quiet domestic little piece: a little barefoot girl who has a half-idiot for a brother, having been educated by her father in virtue's ways and especially in the art of blowing out a candle, secures a good-looking and rich young husband, much to the discomfort of a dashing companion who flouts her—quite in the Cinderella way. A very inartistic turn is given to the play, however, when the Barefoot goes to win the old farmer over to consent to his son's marriage. The farmer meets her in the lane, and finding that her errand is to ask a favor of him, endeavors to pass himself off for some one else, abusing the farmer roundly as a crabbed old miser. But Barefoot knows him, and artfully turns his flank by taking up for the farmer strongly. This is scarcely in accordance with the frankness and simplicity which is held up in the beginning as Barefoot's strongest suit.

Mr. Mayo played the idiot of the piece very well, Mrs. Edwin was up to her usual standard, and Mr. Courtaine won the plaudits at the close which his "double" shared in the first scene. Mrs. Perry did the flirt as well as though she had rehearsed the character in private life quite frequently.

In The Toddlekins the principal characters were taken by Mrs. Saunders and Mr. Courtaine, and were very well rendered. The Toddlekin, a charming little girl of forty-eight years, with a red nose, who skips about the room like a lame lamb and lisp and calls her step-father papa, created a deal of amusement.

At the Opera House, preparations are going on for the production next week of The Magnolia, a Tale of the Bayou. This is a piece very much of The Octoroon order; slaves are in it and bloodhounds, and everything is expected to be very thrilling. It will be put upon the stage with great scenic effect and all the accessories which the manager is so competent to summon and control. This afternoon and evening they play The Idiot of the Mountain—the old story of some man who went up to Washoe and invested, I suppose—with the afterpiece of An Alarming Sacrifice.

On Monday evening next the Academy will be opened by a joint-stock company, who have obtained a lease of the building—the Bell-ringers vacating it, and the forthcoming Opera being transferred to Platt's Hall. The company is identical with the old one of the Metropolitan Theatre, with the exception of Mrs. Jordan, who does not appear—a fact that the public will regret. Miss Fanny Brown is to be the leading lady.

Charles Wheatleigh has returned to town after the completion of a successful engagement at Victoria, and is soon to commence an engagement at the Opera House. He comes home loaded down with "British gold." I congratulate the lovers of good acting on his return, the more especially that he has a pocket full of new plays, which will prove a delightful change in the dramatic dictionary.

INIGO.

MIDSUMMER-DAY SCENE.

THE farmer sat in his easy-chair,
Smoking his pipe of clay,
While his hale old wife, with busy care,
Was clearing the dinner away;
A sweet little girl, with fine blue eyes,
On her grandfather's knee was catching flies.

The old man placed his hand on her head,
With a tear on his wrinkled face,
He thought how often her mother, dead,
Had sat long ago in that place!
As the tear stole down from his half-shut eye,
"Don't smoke," said the child, "how it makes you cry!"

The house-dog slumbered on the floor,
Where the sun, after noon, would steal;
The busy old wife by the open door
Was turning the spinning wheel;
And the old brass clock on the mantel-tree
Had plodded along to almost three;

Still the farmer sat in his easy-chair,
While close to his heaving breast
The moistened brow and the head so fair
Of his dear grandchild was pressed.
His frosty locks mid her soft hair lay—
Fast asleep were they both on that summer-day!

BEN'S BEAR.

THIRTY years ago, my father, a half-pay captain, emigrated to Lower Canada. He bought a farm in the vicinity of Staustead, where he settled with a family of three boys and as many girls. There were too many of us for his means in England, where boys often cost more than they are worth—and possibly this is sometimes true of girls. Brother Ben was nineteen when we went into the bush: a brave boy, and a good leader for his younger brothers, and a good protector for his sisters, who were younger still.

We had a log-house as most settlers had then, to begin with. It was quite an aristocratic edifice for that region, having three large rooms, while most log-houses had but two rooms, and many but one. It was ceiled with hemlock bark, smooth side towards the rooms, for we were to spend one winter in it. We moved to our "opening" the first of May, and had the summer before us. We were full of spirit and hope. A new country and a new life, with all before you to conquer, and the consciousness of strength to make the conquest, is a constant inspiration.

Ben's bear was his first winning in the game which he had set himself to play with the wild nature of the woods. I was then ten years old, and that bear is the one thing that stands out most clearly in the dim distance of thirty years ago. Ben had shot the mother bear, and the same ball that killed her, killed one of the cubs; the other he brought home in his bosom. "Poor little fellow," he said, "he is too young to mourn for his mother, and I intend to be a mother to him." And he kept his word.

The small beast slept with Ben, always laying his nose over Ben's shoulder. He grew apace; I used to think we could see him grow. He was very fond of milk and butter, and he ate bread and milk, and mush and milk, with avidity. During the first winter, his was a numbed sort of half life. In the early spring he was a happy bear, going everywhere with his master, and only miserable if he lost sight of him. He was entirely obedient to my brother, and always woke him in the morning. As my father was about to build a frame-house, he sent Ben to buy material of a man who had a saw-mill in the next town. This was Bruin's first affliction, for he could not accompany his master. Ben stole away from him, and when the bear knew that he was gone, he began to search for him. He went to my brother's bed, and, beginning at the head, inserted his nose under the sheets and blankets, and came out at the foot; then he turned and reversed the process. This strange search he would keep up by the hour, if he were not shut out of the room. He took possession of his master's clothes and other belongings, and used them so roughly, still seeking for their owner—inserting himself into legs of trousers and sleeves of coats—that my mother locked everything in a wardrobe. Nothing of Ben's was left out, except a large folio Bible, which rested on the top of the wardrobe, six or seven feet from the floor. Up this, the bear contrived to climb, and taking the Bible in tender embrace, he curled himself up, and dropped to the floor with it. My mother attempted to take it from him, but for the first time he showed fight. Many blows from the broomstick were administered, but the bear held fast to the book, and my mother came off second best in the contest. This was fatal to her authority, as we discovered afterwards.

When Ben came back, the bear's joy knew no bounds. He lost his love for the sacred volume, and had no care what became of it. He showed his disrespect for my mother by taking the butter from the tea-table and eating it before her eyes. Ben gave him a drubbing for the robbery, and he submitted to Ben's authority, but butter and honey, and sweets of all kinds, were appropriated, if Ben were not at hand to enforce good behavior. My mother was very unhappy, between her love for Ben, and her fear of Bruin. She grew miserably afraid of the bear, and, what was worse, the bear knew it. She complained to Ben; but he only said, "Mother, you have only to be resolute with him. Ellen can drive him away from the table, because she is not afraid of him."

"But I am afraid of him," said my mother, "and I think he will do me harm yet."

"Give him a taste of a hot poker, mother, and I'll answer for him afterwards."

"I would not try it for the world," said my mother.

The bear had his own way very completely, till a circumstance occurred which resulted more favorably for the peace of the family than my mother's mild remonstrances. We had a neighbor, a Mr. Bennett, who had a very lovely daughter of seventeen. Ben fell in love with her, as in duty bound, she being the prettiest girl in the New World. He had been unable to get any clue to her sentiments towards him. She had spent a considerable portion of the past year with a married sister, in Stanstead, and Ben and the brother-in-law being friends, it was there my brother had seen her. Her coolness towards him was a great torment to an impulsive lover. I believe Ben would have served seven years merely to know how she regarded him. At last he lapsed into a state so unhappy and anxious that even his bear could not comfort him. About this time Alice Bennett came home to remain, and in neighborly kindness, she, and a young sister, came to visit us. She had never seen Ben's bear, and did not even know of its existence. Ben shut Bruin into his bedroom in compliment to our guests, and the afternoon passed pleasantly to all but the prisoner. When the time came for Alice and her sister to go home, my brother and I prepared to bear them company through the woods to their opening. Ben incautiously opened his bedroom for his hat, never thinking of Bruin, and came running to catch us. The liberated bear ran after his master, and jumped for joy upon him, hugging him after the manner of bears. Alice turned and saw Ben in the (to her) terrible embrace. She shrieked as a girl with a good voice only can shriek, but instead of running away, she rushed up to my brother, and tried to help him like a brave girl, crying, "Dear, dear Ben, you will be killed."

My brother threw off the beast, and caught the fainting Alice to his glad heart, saying, "Dear Alice, he is a tame bear, do not be afraid."

The poor girl looked like a broken white lily, she was so frightened at herself and the bear. She could hardly realize that the bear was harmless, and she was ashamed of having been betrayed into such an avowal of a tenderness for Ben. When she recovered her wits, she said, "O, I'll never come here again."

"Indeed you will," said Ben. "I'll banish Bruin, or imprison him, or do anything you wish."

It was surprising how clear-sighted Ben became regarding faults on the bear's part that he had hitherto made light of. My mother had no need to complain of stolen butter, or a highway robbery of honey on its way from the pantry to the tea-table. Ben suddenly discovered that his pet was a nuisance. "I don't see how you have borne with him so long, mother," he said, in the most considerate manner, when he had taken a plum-pudding from a plate in my mother's hands, and made his way to the woods with it.

"I am glad you saw him take it," said my mother.

"He must have a prison," said Ben.

And so it came to pass that the poor bear was chained, in the centre of the space that had been cleared and levelled for our new house, with the light surveyor's chain used to measure land. The bear immediately described a circle, limited by the length of his chain, which he walked over, turning a somersault always at one point, and only stopping to eat, or pay attention to Ben, if he came in his vicinity. Why he inaugurated this particular and peculiar exercise I am unable to say, but I have often noticed a tame bear keep up the circle and the somersault hour after hour, and day after day. He did not tug at his chain, nor quarrel with it, as we poor mortals do with chains, but apparently accepted it as a provision of Ben's superior wisdom. This view of the case, if he took it, was sure to be abandoned at bedtime, when he would inevitably break his chain, to get into his master's bedroom. His indomitable desire to lie on the foot of Ben's bed or to hug an old vest under it, was sure to make him break away from any breakable restraint. Therefore a prison was made for him. It was made of small logs, "cobbled up;" that is, the ends notched with an axe, and the end of a log fitted into each notch. The roof was of boards destined for the new house, held in place by heavy stones. The first night the poor beast occupied his new den, he raised the boards in his struggle to get out, impelled by the desire to seek his master. He got his head out, and then hung by his neck, and so was choked to death. I shed some tears for him, and my mother rejoiced. I think Ben was not very sorry. Under other circumstances he would have mourned for the loss of his sublimely ugly pet; but he had a new and life long pet in prospect—perhaps many other pets after that—and he has had no need of, and no place for, a bear.

To most men experience is like the sternlights of a ship, which illumine only the track it has passed.

DEATH OF JASMIN, THE BARBER POET.

THE following sketch of the author of Las Papillotos, we take from the London Ecaminer of October 14th:

Jacques Jasmin, the famous Gascon poet, died last week at Agen, his native town, aged sixty-six. His grandfather was a beggar, his father a hump-backed tailor—in his own words: D'un pere bossu, d'une mere boiteuse naquit un enfant—et cet enfant etait—Moi. A priest educated him, but destiny made him a barber; and on a bright blue flag, bordered with gold, in crossing the street near the entrance of the Promenade du Gravier, at Agen, might, till a few days back, be read the words, "Jasmin, coiffeur." This hair-dresser, whose poetical recitations were worth all the talk of the whole of his fraternity, who never refused to perform the usual duties of his trade, and never denied his humble origin, received, in his time, a laurel crown of gold from St. Clemeuce Isaure, Toulouse; a golden cup from Auch; a gold watch, chain, and seals from Louis Philippe; an emerald ring, once worn by the King's lamented heir, the Duke of Orleans; and personal compliments from high and low. Jasmin began his poetical career (1825) by a poem called Mi cal mouari, (I must die,) which proved him to be an easy and lively versifier. In 1835 appeared Las Papillotos, (The Curl Papers,) and in 1836 the famous L'Abuglo de Castel-Cuillé, (The Blind Girl of Castel-Cuillé,) the history of a girl abandoned by her lover on her being struck blind—highly eulogised by the French publicist, M. de Saint Beuve. In 1840, Jasmin went to Paris to recite his poems, and he obtained—it is understood through the late Duchess of Orleans—a pension of a thousand francs from M. de Salvandy, then Minister of the Interior. He also received shortly afterwards the Cross of the Legion of Honor, but declined to accept any employment which would take him away from his "Sweet South," and his hairdressing business. He travelled from town to town of the south reciting his poetry like an ancient troubadour. "I am indeed a troubadour," he once said in the innocence of his heart, "but I am far beyond them all; they were but beginners; they never composed a poem like my Franconeto." This poem was produced in 1840; Martha la Folle, in 1844; Les Deux Frères Jumeaux, in 1845; La Semaine d'un Fils, in 1849. This latter was a remarkable poem. Then we have Ma Vigne (My Vine,) a letter to Madame Louis Veill at Paris, in which the poet charmingly describes his birds, his flowers, his fruit, etc., and in the most naïve manner confesses that, whereas in his youth he had stolen much fruit, he, by way of repentance, now allowed himself to be robbed. Jasmin was a great reciter—an improvisatore of passionate gestures and extraordinary play of feature—and evidence of his talents in this respect is afforded in a very interesting account which was given of an interview with him in the Bearn and the Pyrenees of Miss Costello, who in that work, gave English versions of several of his poems. "I am accused of vanity," he exclaimed on the occasion of this interview, "but I am a child of nature and cannot conceal my feelings; the only difference between me and a man of refinement is, that he knows how to conceal his vanity and exultation of success, which I let everybody see." Jasmin was, in short, extremely vain, full of southern passionateness of a somewhat childish character; but he was a kind-hearted, worthy man, who never disclaimed his origin, but whose pride it was to have been able to support his parents; who was never above "frizzling hair," as was said of him, though he wore the Legion of Honor; and who was always kindly and charitable to those whom he never refused to own as his brethren—the poorest of the poor. Jasmin, it must be added, had received—besides several medals from academies, etc.—the Spanish Order of Isabella the Catholic, and the Order of Gregory the Great from Pope Pius IX., for the poet's devotion to religion. His last work was another volume of Papillotos, published last year.

BOUND VOLUMES OF THE CALIFORNIAN.—Those wishing bound copies of the First Volume of THE CALIFORNIAN can procure them by leaving their orders at this office. The convenient form in which THE CALIFORNIAN is published, and the varied nature of its contents eminently fit it for preservation. In the current volume will be found the only English translation of La Comtesse Diane—the most brilliant of Mario Uchard's romances: also the story of Annie and her Master, one of the most charming and delicate stories ever published in any language; the romance of Mary Stuart and Chastelar—a thrilling reminiscence of Scotland's fair young Queen and her poet lover; and the Notting Hill Mystery, showing the unravelling of a terrible thread of crime strikingly analogous in all its salient details to the crime of La Pommerais, the French poisoner, whose late trial and execution are still fresh in the minds of all readers. This volume contains 432 pages. Subscribers for a bound copy can have their names handsomely lettered in gold upon the volume, and the book will be delivered at their residences on leaving their order and address. Price, $5.

At Birdsile, Eng., recently, a boy was sentenced to six months hard labor in jail for taking six walnuts from a tree which did not belong to him.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING
Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REDUCTION AND AMALGAMATION OF Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES
NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

As a guarantee of what this machine will do, I propose, with any gentleman who will produce an Amalgamator that will work the same amount of ore in the same number of hours, with the same outlay of power, and produce the equal result, to deposit the sum of FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS each, the money so deposited to be drawn by the person who shall be declared to have produced the best result. The money (the $500) by whichever party won to be paid over to some one of the benevolent institutions in this State, to be named by the party losing. This proposition is not made with the view of detracting from the merits of any Amalgamator now before the public, but for the purpose of placing this valuable improvement before such persons as may be interested in quartz milling, and to whom the matter properly belongs.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs. in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration, particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers, and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

Jamaica Ginger!

This valuable compound, which is now regarded as one of the most popular remedies in the domestic practice for various complaints of the digestive organs, such as Dyspepsia, Nausea, etc., is prepared solely from the WHITE JAMAICA GINGER, which is the best of all the varieties in use. In the preparation of

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER,

Great care is taken to have none but select Root, and to manufacture it in air-tight vessels, thus preventing the evaporation of its delicate essential oil, and preserving the true aroma of the Ginger. It thereby contains in its concentrated form all the valuable properties of the Jamaica Ginger, and is guaranteed to be free from any impurities whatever.

It is a grateful stimulant and carminative, giving warmth and tone to the stomach equal to Brandy, without any of its injurious effects.

It will cure Nausea, caused by riding in railroad cars, or from sea-sickness, or other causes.

Miners and others who are exposed to the heat of the Sun often whilst working in cold water, should never be without

REDINGTON & CO.'S

ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER.

As by taking it as a tonic two or three times a day, it is almost a sure preventive to Chills and Fever; and to those who are farming the rich bottom lands of California it is likewise invaluable as a tonic, and should invariably be taken in the early morning before going to the fields, at the mid-day lunch, and before leaving off work at night.

Ask for REDINGTON & CO.'S ESSENCE OF JAMAICA GINGER, and take no other, if you would always have a Pure and Reliable article.

THE MEDICAL FACULTY

May differ in relation to the treatment of disease, but there is very little diversity of opinion among them as to its origin. The philanthropist does not contend that any man becomes at once a

DRUNKARD OR A THIEF.

Nor does the well informed physician maintain that any one becomes at once an invalid. He knows that almost all diseases are of slow growth; that the seeds of disease are often sown at a remote period, and only await some change of climate or condition of the individual to manifest themselves.

It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. LITTLE NELLY.

O BONNIE, winsome Nell,
With footsteps like the fawn,
We love thy bright face well
As skylarks love the dawn;
What prophet e'er unveil
Thy hidden destiny?
Who guide thy fluttering sail
O'er Time's unresting sea?

Painted like primrose-tips
Is thy young glowing cheek,
And on thy rose-leaf lips
A bee might honey seek;
The violet's leafy lid
Hath not so soft a hue,
As when thine eyes—half-hid—
Peep their dark fringes through!

Never did sunset-cloud
So bright a ray unfold,
Never had silk-worm's shroud
So fine a web of gold,
Never did tassel shine
Or silken tangle curl,
Fair as thy ringlets twine,
My darling little girl!

Never should jewels hide
Thy water-lily brow,
Nor glittering gems should wind
Thy tiny neck of snow;
But leaves from the green pines
That grow upon the hills,
Sweet flowers and mossy vines
That twine about the rills;
Snow-drops and berries red,
Things wild and pure and free,
Shells that the blue tides spread,
Seem all more meet for thee.

Oh, for an angel's hand,
To hold thine hour-glass,
While slow, love's precious sand
Through long bright years may pass;
An angel hand to bless
To guard thee day and night
And from this wilderness,
Go with thee in thy flight!

EMILIE LAWSON.

WITTY JUDGMENTS OF THE DUKE OF OSSUNNA.

THE Duke of Ossunna, viceroy at Naples for the king of Spain, to whom the Neapolitan territory was then subject, acquired great celebrity for the tact and wisdom of the judgments he delivered. This nobleman, on visiting the galleys one festival day for the purpose of liberating a captive, according to use and wont, found all the prisoners loud in asserting their innocence. One declared that his condemnation was the work of enemies; another asserted that he had been informally and unjustly convicted; a third declared that he had been mistaken for another person; and so on. All declared themselves guiltless as cradled babes. At last the duke came to one man who took a very different tone. "I do not believe, my noble lord," said he, "that there is a greater rascal in all Naples than myself. They were too lenient with me to send me to the galleys." The duke, hearing these words, turned immediately round to the keeper of the galleys, and exclaimed, "Loose this scoundrel's chain, and turn him immediately about his business. If he is allowed to stay, he will certainly corrupt these honest, innocent men here. Take him away." While his orders were being obeyed, he wheeled round to the other captives, and said to them, with the most civil air imaginable, "Gentlemen, I have no doubt you will thank me for ridding you of this pestilent fellow. He might have undermined your innocence."

The Duke of Ossunna was somewhat like Haroun Alraschid, a little despotical even in his good doings. Ferromelle, a rich merchant of Naples, whose predominant passion was avarice, chanced to lose an embroidered purse, containing fifty golden ducats, fifty Spanish pistoles, and a ring of the value of a thousand crowns. This loss vexed him grievously, and he caused a proclamation to be made offering fifty Spanish pistoles to any one who should restore the missing articles. An old woman found the purse, and brought it to the owner. Ferromelle, as soon as he saw his property, could not withstand the temptation of trying to avoid payment of part of the reward. In counting the fifty pistoles, he dexterously laid aside thirty, and said to the finder, "I promised fifty pistoles to whoever found the purse. Thirty have been taken out of it already by you; here are the other twenty, and so you are paid." The old woman remonstrated in vain against this treatment, but she would probably have remained content with her twenty pistoles, had not some one advised her to apply for justice to the Duke of Ossunna. The duke knew the man well, and sent for him. "Is there any likelihood," said he to Ferromelle, "that this old woman, who had the honesty to bring you the purse when she might have taken all, would be guilty of taking your thirty pistoles? No, no. The truth is, the purse cannot be yours. Your purse had fifty pistoles, and this had but twenty. This purse cannot be yours." The merchant stammered out, "My lord, I know the purse, the ducats, the ring!"—"Nonsense!" exclaimed the duke; "do you think there never was a purse, or ducats, or a ring, like yours? Here, good woman," continued he, addressing the old woman, "take you the purse, and its contents. It cannot be this good gentleman's, since he said his had fifty pistoles." This judgment was enforced. The duke might have been morally certain of the miser's attempt to cheat, but, as has been said, this was a very Haroun-Alraschid-like kind of a decision.

The duke had one day to hear the case of Bertrand de Sols, a proud Spanish gentleman, who was in the habit of walking in the streets with his head elevated like a camelopard's. While thus marching, a porter, carrying a heavy load, had run against him, but not without first crying "Beware! which is the ordinary mode of giving warning in such cases. The porter's load consisted of fagots, and one of them fell off in the concussion, and tore the Spaniard's silk mantle. He was mightily enraged, and sought redress from the viceroy. The duke knew that porters usually cry "Beware," and having seen the porter in this case, he learned that he had cried the word, though de Sols avouched the contrary. The duke advised the porter to declare himself dumb when the cause came for judgment. The porter did so through a friend, and the duke immediately said to de Sols, "what can I do to this poor fellow! You see he is dumb." Forgetting himself, the enraged Spaniard cried out, "Don't believe the scoundrel, my lord; I myself heard him cry 'Beware!'" "Why then, did you not beware?" replied the duke, and he made the mortified Spaniard pay all expenses, and a fine to the poor.

THE "EMERALDS" OF HISTORY.

"Of all green things, which bounteous earth supplies, Nothing in greenness with the emerald vies."
—Marbodius, A.D. 1081.

THE great beauty of the Emerald has always attracted admiration. Among gems it takes rank after the diamond and the Oriental ruby, and it is nearly as hard as the topaz. It is almost exclusively indebted for its value to its charming color, which is, in general, well characterized by that pure and velvety hue, which has hence received the name of emerald green. It, however, varies somewhat, inclining, at times, to verdigris or grass green, and frequently becoming rather pale. This fine color is occasioned by the presence of about one per cent. of the oxide of chrome, to which, indeed, may be attributed the principal distinction between it and the beryl. Fine specimens are so rare, and in such demand, that a particular suit has been known to have passed into the possession of a series of purchasers, and to have made the tour of Europe, in the course of half a century.

The opinion has prevailed among writers on gems that the true emerald was unknown in Europe prior to the conquests of Mexico and Peru—in the first third of the sixteenth century—the contrary, however, is the fact; for, as we shall presently see, the ancients were abundantly supplied, not merely with it, but, also, with the green ruby—a much harder, and a much rarer stone.

Although some doubt exists as to the correctness of the translation, we find the emerald (Nophech, in Hebrew) mentioned several times in the Bible. It was the first stone in the second row of the breast-plate of the High Priest; it was used as a signet or seal; and as an ornament of clothing and bedding. It is frequently spoken of in the "Book of Revelations" as one of the foundations of Jerusalem, and it is compared to the rainbow round the Throne.

A large uncut emerald adorns the Iron Crown of Lombardy, made at the end of the sixth century, and which has never been altered since that period; an emerald, also, appears in the Cross of Lotharius, a work of the ninth century; and in the Crown of Hungary, of the tenth. History describes one in the tiara of the Sovereign Pontiff—when in Paris, in 1804—consisting of a cylinder, about two inches in length, by two and a quarter broad, which is believed to have been brought from Africa, as it bears the name of Julius the Second, who died twenty-nine years before the conquest of Peru, and eighteen years before that of Mexico.

The Romans derived their principal supply from the Zebrah mines, in the vicinity of Coptos, Egypt—extensive traces of these workings are described by Sir J. G. Wilkinson, by whom several specimens were deposited in the British Museum. Inferior emeralds were also obtained from the Isle of Cyprus. Pliny states that when Lucullus landed at Alexandria, Ptolemy presented him with a large emerald having his portrait engraved on it. The Emperor Nero, who labored under myopia, was accustomed to view the combats of the gladiators through an emerald hollowed out at the back, thus acting as a concave lens, to assist his sight in watching the distant scene, below his seat, in the amphitheatre. As an illustration of the high esteem in which emeralds were held, as well as of the profusion of jewelry worn by Roman ladies in the first century, we are told by a cotemporary historian that: "Lollia Panlina, once the wife of the Emperor Caligula, shone in altars of emeralds and pearls over all her head, her ears, her neck; necklace, and fingers;" the value of all of which amounted in our money to upwards of two millions of dollars!—"which she was ready to attest, by the production of the vouchers for the prices paid!"

Mexico has produced crystals of rare beauty, which were no less appreciated by the rulers of the Aztecs than were those of Peru by its Incas. Among the royal fifth of the spoils of Mexico, which Cortez sent to the Emperor Charles the Fifth (May 15th, 1522) was an emerald cut in pyramidal form, as broad as the palm of the hand; but, alas! the ship, containing the treasure was captured by a French privateer, and the rich spoils of the Aztecs went into the coffers of his most Christian Majesty Francis the First, who gazed, with pardonable envy, on the wealth which his imperial rival drew from his colonial domains, and intimated his discontent (says Preston) by peevishly expressing a desire "to see the clause in Adam's will which entitled his brothers of Castile and Portugal to divide the New World between them." On his return to Spain, Cortez sought a second wife, and paid his addresses to Doña Juana de Zuniga, niece of the Duke de Bejar. One of his presents to his youthful bride excited the admiration and the envy of the fairer part of the court; this was five emeralds of wonderful size and brilliancy—one of these gems was as valuable as Solylock's Turquoise; for it some Genoese merchants (we are told by Gomara) offered Cortez forty thousand ducats. The same author gives a more particular account of these jewels, which may interest our readers, indicating, at the same time, the exquisite ingenuity of the natives, who, without steel, could cut so hard a material, and thereby enhance their original value. One emerald was in the form of a rose; the second in that of a horn; the third like a fish, with eyes of gold; the fourth was a little bell, with a fine pearl for the tongue, (and on the rim was this inscription, in Spanish: "Blessed is he who created thee;") and the fifth, which was the most valuable, was a small cup, with a foot of gold, and four little chains of the same metal attached to a large pearl as a button, the edge of the cup was of gold, on which was a Latin inscription. These emeralds were part of the treasure of the ill-fated Montezuma, and, being very portable, easily escaped the general wreck of the noche triste, or melancholy night that the Spaniards abandoned the capital. The wife of the Emperor Charles the Fifth, it is said—it may be but idle gossip of the court—intimated a desire to possess some of these baubles, and the preference which Cortez gave to his fair bride caused some feeling of estrangement in the royal bosom, which had an unfavorable influence on the future fortunes of the Marquess.

One of the largest emeralds that has been mentioned is said to have been possessed by the inhabitants of the Valley of Manta, in Peru—at the time of the Spanish conquest. It was the size of an ostrich's egg, and was worshipped by the natives as the "Goddess or Mother of Emeralds." Smaller ones were brought as offerings to it, which the priests distinguished by the appellation of "daughters." It fell into the hands of Pizarro, whose rude followers did not know the value of those picked up by them, as they broke many in pieces with hammers. They were led to this extraordinary proceeding by one of the Dominican missionaries, who assured them that it could not be broken; however, it was observed that the crafty Father did not subject his own collection to this experiment, and, as the stones consequently fell in value, he carried back a number of them to Panama. In the mine of Muso, in Tunca Valley, near Santa Fe de Bogota, (now a portion of the Republic of New Granada,) have been found some of the most magnificent specimens known to exist. A hexagonal prism, from that locality, upwards of three inches in length, and about two in diameter, has been for years an heirloom in the family of the Duke of Devonshire; it weighs nine ounces; and, although imperfect for the lapidary's purposes, it is admittedly the first crystallized emerald in Great Britain. In the same matchless collection there is a superb cameo emerald of extraordinary magnitude, cut into a full-faced Medusa's head, in very high relief. Prescott, also, alludes to the fair river of emeralds, in Ecuador, so called from the quarries of the beautiful gem on its borders, from which the Indian monarchs formerly enriched their treasures. Stevenson, who visited this part of the coast early in the present century, is profuse in his description of its untold wealth. In the district of Atacames this inflexible material seems to have been as ductile in the hands of the Peruvian artists as it was with the Aztecs.

Benvenuto Cellini, speaking of the antique gems he was in the habit of buying from the country people during his residence at home, tells us that he there obtained an emerald engraved with a horse's head, which he subsequently sold for "many hundred crowns." An exquisitely-cut stone is in the Hope Collection, in London, weighing six ounces, and perfect both in color and transparency; it is believed to be from Coimbatore, in the Presidency of Madras. In Queen Victoria's "Crown of State," there is an emerald seven inches round, which is of great value; and in the "Imperial Crown," constructed for her coronation, in addition to eleven huge emeralds, there are five rubies, seventeen sapphires, two hundred and seventy-seven pearls, and two thousand seven hundred and eighty-three diamonds, set in gold and silver. Its gross weight (including a crimson velvet cap, and a white silk lining with ermine border) being thirty-nine and a quarter ounces. A fine specimen was presented by one of the Kings of Spain to the Church of Loretto, consisting of a mass of white quartz thickly implanted with emeralds. The Hindoos of the present day are very fond of the emerald, especially when found in pear-shape, and worn as an ear-drop. They also wear it in bracelets, and many a glorious gem of this species have they remorselessly ruined, by drilling a hole through it, for the purpose of stringing it as a bead; one of the finest known was thus to be seen martyred on the arm of Runjeet Singh. The fan presented by the Princess of Wales on her marriage, by that great Eastern, Dhuleep Singh, was laden with emeralds.

Hardly any other gem is so liable to defects, even the smallest Peruvian emerald, when cut, will show one or more flaws on its surface; indeed, the absence of any is, of itself, sufficient to excite the suspicion that it is merely an imitation, for no other precious stone can be so exactly counterfeited by a paste, and, in consequence of this great liability to defects, no gem varies so much in value. It becomes electric by being rubbed, and, when heated in the fire, it changes its color to a deep blue, but recovers its green when cold. They are considered to appear to the greatest advantage when table cut, and set in brilliants, the lustre of which forms an agreeable contrast to the quiet hue of the emerald. A favorite mode of setting, among the opulent inhabitants of Peru, is to make them up into clusters of artificial flowers, on gold stems. It is worthy of mention that the gem engravers of old were accustomed to refresh their wearied eyes by gazing, for some minutes upon an emerald kept by them for that purpose.

Pliny's description of an emerald (written in the first century) will form a suitable conclusion to this long article: "It emulates, if it does not surpass, the beauty of spring, and the eye, satiated by the dazzling glare of the more brilliant gems, is refreshed and strengthened by the quiet enlivening green of the emerald. No other color is so pleasing to the sight, for grass and green foliage we view with pleasure, but emeralds with so much the greater delight, as nothing whatever compared with them equals them in the intensity of its green." After reading this just panegyric, can any one doubt that Pliny was acquainted with the true emerald?—Home Journal.

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE—THE CASE OF MONS. D'EGVILLE.

THIS remarkable case of circumstantial evidence, though generally known to the curious in such matters who have searched into West Indian records, is as yet, we believe, entirely new to the American public. The details, however, might never have been laid before them had not the original papers been recently discovered in the Provost Marshal's office in Barbadoes, and copied and forwarded to the writer. Besides the intrinsic interest attaching to the story itself as a mere anecdote, there is the object of adding another instance to the list of executions carried out upon the evidence of circumstances alone, and of exhibiting some of the strong as well as the weak points which characterize this peculiar form of judgment. Perhaps a close and careful comparison of numerous instances of circumstantial evidence might assist in molding into something like a system the various and sometimes almost contradictory inferences deduced during trials of this character, and in bringing them under a legal form which might be applied when similar occasions required. At present it is well known that the law of circumstantial evidence is very uncertain, and the story before us is a most conspicuous instance.

In the year 1824, Michael Harvey Peter William Henry D'Egville, resident in the island of Barbadoes, West Indies, dancing master, was brought up before the local June Sessions charged with having caused the death of his wife by administering to her poison in the form of arsenic.

The name of D'Egville has been always famous as the title of a family of dancing masters and mistresses; there were some of the family, I believe, in Cheltenham when I was a boy, and I certainly was instructed in the art by a D'Egville, though whether the name was assumed as a recommendation or not I cannot say. The unhappy man of whom I write had, though a Frenchman, migrated to Barbadoes with the view of teaching dancing, and was, it is reported, very successful. After a somewhat long residence in the island, he married a lady whose family name was Llewellyn, though whether maid or widow at the time of her union with D'Egville is not shown. The Frenchman was not a man of good character; he was addicted to debauched society and to drink. In many of his tipsy fits he was wont to strike and ill-use his wife, though he never seemed to cherish the least ill-feeling towards her. He was not therefore malicious, though he was quarrelsome in his cups. Still, his ill-usage of Mrs. D'Egville was so continuous and excessive that the long-suffering wife determined upon a separation. This was effected without any scene of violence or recrimination between the parties; and while the dissolute husband pursued at uncertain intervals his profession of dancing master, the relieved wife lived at some distance, out of his and harm's way, as was supposed. It is to be particularly noticed that, though separated from each other, no ill-feeling was to be discerned between Mr. and Mrs. D'Egville. On the contrary, the wife was in the habit of sending to her deprived partner little attentions in the form of dainties, such as she knew he was attached to, as, for instance, fruit, soup, rare fish, etc. D'Egville recognized these attentions, and (occasionally) returned them, though the fluctuation of his gains at times prohibited an equivalent interchange of gifts. Now D'Egville was aware that his wife had not only signified her intention of leaving to him a sum of money at her death, but had actually executed the instrument by which he was to be entitled at her demise to a bequest of £500 old Barbadoes currency, i. e., about £330 sterling.

It was proved that D'Egville had bought arsenic some few days previously at a druggist's shop, and being asked if it was required for rats, said, "Yes; and I shouldn't care much if they were two-legged ones!" Observe, that to be in possession of arsenic was nothing of itself, for there generally was a supply in every house in the island for the extermination of rats and wood-ants; indeed, I can vouch for the fact of my grandfather keeping a very large quantity in the medicine chest for periodical poisoning of wood-ants which infested one of the mills on his estates, so that no stress can be laid on the mere purchase of the arsenic.

Mrs. D'Egville was particularly fond of toasted cheese, and at times of the year cheese was a very scarce article in the island. However, things had been prosperous with the Frenchman of late; for he purchased a piece, had it prepared, and sent it to his wife by the hands of a little mulatto boy, with these instructions: "Tell her to eat it herself, and not to give any of it to Miss Llewellyn." This was Mrs. D'Egville's sister, who lived in the same house with her.

Mrs. D'Egville was found dead in her bed next morning; Miss Llewellyn was dead also, and two or three of the negro servants were ill, though they ultimately recovered.

An inquest was immediately held, and Dr. Cutting tested the contents of the stomachs of the deceased, the rejected matter from the negroes who were suffering at the time, and the remainder of the cheese which was left in the dish. In all was arsenic found.

D'Egville was arrested, and brought up at the June Sessions in 1824. It was the interim between the death of the late Attorney-General Beckles and the appointment of his successor, and Mr. Coulthurst (acting attorney-general) prosecuted. Mr. Hinds defended the prisoner, resting his defense on the fact that a link in the chain of evidence was wanting. This meant of course the evidence of the little mulatto boy who had carried the cheese to Mrs. D'Egville, for negro evidence could not be received in court at that time.

The jury, after long consultation, came into court and said that it was impossible that they could ever agree, nine of their number being for an acquittal and three for a verdict of "Guilty;" so they were discharged, and the prisoner remanded to the next session. Meantime, Samuel Hinds was appointed Attorney-General. When the sessions arrived (December, 1824,) Mr. Hinds declined to prosecute, on the ground of having formerly defended the prisoner, so the prosecution devolved upon Mr. Solicitor-General Griffith. The jury were empaneled, the evidences and all other proceedings carried on from the last sessions were read over to them, and after a short deliberation they brought in a verdict of "Guilty."

The common precaution of inquiry into the conduct and motives of the person through whose hands the poisoned cheese had last passed was cast aside, and this being not received, the poor dancing-master returned to prison without a hope. His death warrant was duly carried into effect.

Some years afterward, when D'Egville's name was forgotten, a negro man who had been a slave in the possession of Mrs. D'Egville, and who was, by her father's will, to receive his manumission, confessed that he had received the cheese from the mulatto boy and had put in the arsenic, as he was aware that his freedom was to follow upon his mistress's death. The link wanting (as the learned counsel observed,) namely, what had passed between the time the cheese was put out of D'Egville's hands and its delivery into those of his wife, was now supplied. The negro's name was Christian, and he went, as was usual, by the family name of Llewellyn. All this he confessed upon his deathbed, to the great discomfiture of those who had condemned the wretched dancing-master, and to the shame of the system of refusing any evidence, though from negro lips, in a trial where life and death depended upon evidence alone.

OH, GRIEF! thou art classed amongst the depressing passions! And true it is, thou humblest to the dust, but also thou exaltest to the clouds. Thou shakest us with ague, but also thou steadiest like frost. Thou sickenest the heart, but thou also healest its infirmities.—De Quincey.

LOCAL MATTERS OF THE WEEK.

ON Monday afternoon last, a man named James Fitzmorris entered the apartment occupied by A. J. Haight, jeweller and gold pen manufacturer, in the building No. 434 California street, and representing himself as a Government detective in the employment of Provost-Marshal General Mason, whose headquarters are in the same building, entered into conversation with Mr. Haight, who was at the time engaged at work. On a table near him lay a number of gold watches and pens. Dropping something on the floor, Mr. Haight stooped to pick it up, and while in that position Fitzmorris struck him a blow on the temple with a heavy iron wrench, following it up with two others in rapid succession, but which fell on the back of his head near the neck, the last being partially warded off by his hand, though the weight of the blow broke his little finger. Haight alarmed the occupants of the adjoining rooms with the cry of "murder!" They, on reaching the door, discovered Haight covered with blood, and Fitzmorris in the act of leaving the premises. A Mr. Webster ordered him to stop until the matter was explained, and a soldier of the Provost-Guard assisted him in turning the man over to the Police. The wounds of Mr. Haight are severe, though not considered dangerous. There seems to have been a deliberate design on the part of Fitzmorris to murder Haight and plunder his establishment. Perhaps the fact that Mr. Haight's head was under the table when the blows were struck prevented the consummation of the assassin's intention. The examination of the case has been continued by the Police Judge until to-day.

A MEETING of citizens was held on the 12th inst. at the Unitarian Church to devise measures for ascertaining the truth of reports current that the Indians of this State were in a state of great destitution for food and clothing. A committee of correspondence were selected to ascertain the facts of the case, and if necessary call a mass meeting of citizens to raise the necessary relief. Hon. Nathaniel Gray, Dr. Gibbons, Rev. Mr. Simonds, William Shew and John Beeson comprise the committee.

A RIOT occurred on Sunday last opposite the Pavilion, in which some dozen or more rowdies participated. Paving stones, and iron bolts as war clubs, were freely used, and some of the parties were severely wounded. Officer Miles, in attempting to quell the disturbance, was roughly handled. It was a disgraceful affair, and we regret to say that the men engaged in it were members of our Fire Department.

A PLEASANT wedding party came off at the Cosmopolitan Hotel one evening last week. The bridegroom was James C. Mayer, son of I. C. Mayer, the Montgomery street fur merchant, and the bride, Miss S. Addie Wood, who arrived from the East by the Golden City. She is the daughter of Hon. A. Wood, of Chittenango, N. Y.

ON Sunday evening a party of Chinamen entered the house of one of their countrymen in Washington Alley and entertained each other with a grand bowie knife and slung-shot fandango, in which three or four of the participants received terrible injuries. Four of the ringleaders were arrested on charges of assault to commit murder.

A FIRE broke out on Tuesday night in the basement of the store, No. 425 Front street. The engines were promptly on the ground and prevented a serious conflagration, as the building was filled with paints, oils, camphene, and other inflammable materials.

THE jewelry store of C. Truelson, on Montgomery street, between California and Pine, was entered on Tuesday morning, about half-past seven o'clock, and robbed of a thousand dollars worth of valuables, while the owner was gone to breakfast.

MR. T. H. HITTLE's Digest of the California Statutes is completed, and arrangements are being made to have it printed. The work embraces not only a digest of the laws in force, but is a complete history of the legislation of the State from the meeting of the first Legislature to the close of the last.

A FIRE broke out on Sunday last, in the old building near the corner of Washington and Davis streets. The adjoining buildings were more or less damaged, and about 80 tons of hay were destroyed.

WILLIAM BROWN, a member of Engine No. 14, fell from a third-story window in the rear of the engine house, a distance of thirty-seven feet, last Saturday night. He is recovering from the injuries sustained, which were slight.

THE Association of Fishermen invite the Managers of the Orphan Asylums to send to their market every Monday or Tuesday morning and get a supply of fresh fish for their institutions, gratis.

THE Mechanics' Institute have petitioned the Board of Supervisors for permission to retain Union Square until the 30th of September, 1865, to enable them to hold another Industrial Fair.

A SLIGHT earthquake shock was experienced in this city on Sunday night last, at 10 minutes to 9 o'clock, and again on Monday at 10 minutes past 3 P. M.

SEVERAL hundred citizens have protested against permitting slaughter houses on Brannan street after the 18th of this month.

THE public schools closed for their annual holiday vacation yesterday.

A PRIZE-FIGHT is advertised to come off next Thursday, in defiance of the law in such cases made and provided.

THE Golden City, on Tuesday, carried away $1,022,188,10 in treasure.

THE steamship America arrived on Wednesday, bringing her passengers through from New York in 24 days.

THE PAST.

WHY wilt thou ever thus before me stand,
Thou ghostly Past?
Always between me and the happy land
Thy shade is cast!

Thou makest all things heavy with regret;
"Too late!" "Too soon!"
My mind is like a sun that ever sets,
And knows no noon.

For every motion that has crossed my brain
Leaves such a trace,
That every instant it may rise again
And claim its place.

Faces or fancies I have craved or cherished
Throng round my head;
In vain I call on thee to leave the perished
And hide the dead.

Save (when the future wins my yearning gaze)
That shore where still Imagination resolutely stays
The tide of ill.—[R. Moncton Milnes.

CHAPTER VI.

THE END OF THE WORLD.

THE sun was low when Francis Tredethlyn left the Crown Inn, and walked slowly up the village street. The sun was low, and already a crimson glory flickered here and there upon the quaint old casements. The young man walked slowly about him with a half doubtful, half bewildered gaze, like a man who sees his native village in a dream. And indeed no village in the vision of a sleeper could be more tranquil in its rustic repose than this Cornish street, steep and stony, mounting to the summit of a hill, upon whose top the great gates of Landresdale loomed grim and stately, like the entrance to an ogre's castle in fairy-land. You climbed the steep little street, and you came to the big gates of Landresdale; and that was all. The village ended here, and there was nothing for you to do but to go back again. It was like coming to the end of the world, and finding a great Elizabethan door of ponderous oak and iron barred against any chaotic realm that might lie beyond our every-day earth. There may have been occasions—indeed, the inhabitants of Landresdale would have testified to many such—on which those ponderous doors swung open on their mighty hinges; but the ignorant traveller, looking at them shut, found it difficult to realize the possibility of their ever being opened. They looked like the doors of a mausoleum, which may open once in half a century to admit the coffined dead, but can never be unclosed for any meaner purpose. Grim towers flanked the stony arch on either side, and two old rusty cannon displayed their iron noses within the shadow of the towers, ready to fire a volley down the hilly street whenever the simple folks of Landresdale should evince any revolutionary tendencies.

To the right of the great gates there was a handsome wing of solid masonry, whose Tudor windows opened on a square courtyard, where there were more cannon, and upon a prim, old-fashioned garden, shut in by a high wall, and only visible to the wanderer through the iron rails and arabesques of a lofty gate, amidst whose scroll-work the arms of the Landresdales and Treverbys, the Courtenays and Polwhelses, were interlaced and entangled.

The garden wall bounded the estate of Rashleigh Vyvyan Trevannence, Marquis of Landresdale, and beneath the shelter of that old, ivy-covered, red brick wall, lay the churchyard, quiet and shadowy, dark with the dense foliage of great yew trees, thick with long tangled grass that grew high amongst the slanting headstones. Francis Tredethlyn stopped by the low wooden gate, and leaning against the moss-grown pillar that supported it, looked up at the square towers which seemed like stony sentinels for ever keeping guard over the entrance to Landresdale. The light was red upon the corner window that faced the western sky, but all the other casements stared blankly and darkly out upon the graves in the churchyard, and the empty village street, in which one woman, toiling slowly upwards with a pitcher of water that slopped and trickled at intervals upon the pavement, was the only living presence.

"The great gates look just the same as they used to look," thought Francis Tredethlyn. "When I was a boy, and read fairy tales, I always fancied that the enchanted castle the wandering prince came to in the middle of a wood, or on the summit of a great mountain, was like Landresdale, a castle standing all alone in the middle of the way, with no road to right nor the left, so that the prince must go in and ask shelter, though he knew that harm would come of it, or else go back and lose all the trouble of his journey. How I used to long to pull that bell when I was a lad!" thought Francis, looking at the iron ring which swung from a massive chain on one side of the archway.

"But I've no need to dawdle here," he thought, as he pushed the gate open and went into the churchyard. "It seems as if the nearer I get to the place where I am certain to hear the truth about Susan, the more I dread hearing it."

The ignorant traveller who might turn away from the great gates of Landresdale to descend the hill under the impression that the county of Cornwall came to an abrupt termination upon the threshold of the Marquis' domain, would have been mistaken. There were other and higher lands, broad stretches of hill and moorland, lying beyond the churchyard, to the right of the quaint old garden and the Gothic towers and casements; and it was thitherward that Francis Tredethlyn directed his steps. He crossed the churchyard, only pausing briefly before one tombstone, upon which the names of Sarah and Jonathan Tredethlyn were cut, low down on the stone, at the bottom of a long list of Tredethlyns, who lay buried in that churchyard. The young man let himself out of the solemn precinct by a little rusty iron gate that opened on a broad expanse of common land sloping upward towards the western sky, and only broken here and there by a quarry or a patch of water.

"It looks bleak and barren enough," thought Francis, with a shudder; "but it's hereabouts that my uncle Oliver picked up a good bit of his money; the tin mines he out yonder; and the stone quarry in the hollow there brought him in plenty, if folks tell the truth."

Francis Tredethlyn might have echoed the boast of Helen Macgregor had he chosen, and with stronger justification than that lady, for the earth upon which he trod was not only his native land, but his own peculiar property, by virtue of certain yellow-looking parchments under the sign-manual of an Earl and Baron of Landresdale who flourished in the reign of James I., and by payment of an eccentric annual tribute in the shape of a young doe and a hundredweight of virgin tin. It was all his own, this bleak waste land which Francis Tredethlyn, late private soldier in her Majesty's service, late valet to a capricious master, now trod under his feet. Nor was it the less to be considered for its barrenness of aspect, for rich metals lay deep below the heathery surface, in mines that were amongst the oldest and most valuable in Cornwall.

But Francis was in no wise elated or disturbed by the importance of his possession. He had never felt any ardent desire for wealth, and as yet he had not begun to realize its manifold advantages. He saw the effect of his fortune upon other men, and smiled at their weakness; but what had been true of him in the first hour of his altered position was true of him now—he had no power either to realize or rejoice in the extent of his riches.

He walked slowly across the barren moorland, always upward, always mounting towards a long ridge of western hill, behind which two streaks of yellow light stretched low against the darkening sky—a bleak, bare-looking hill, that seemed the very end of the world. It was upon this hillside that Tredethlyn Grange had been built four centuries ago, in the days when men built their houses with a view to endurance; and it stood there still, a long gray tenement of moss-grown stone, with narrow casement windows, looking darkly out upon the twilight moor; the larger portion of the old house had been uninhabited during the tenantry of the Tredethlyns, who, in a spirit of economy, had located themselves in the inferior rooms of the rambling mansion. It was in one of these rooms that a light now twinkled faintly, and it was towards this end of the house that Francis directed his steps. There had been a moat once on two sides of the house, but cabbages now grew upon the sloping earth; there had been a garden once before the Grange, and an old stone sun-dial still marked the spot; but of all the trim flower-beds and angular paths there remained no vestige now. A field of trefoil, bounded by a low stone wall, lay beyond two broken pillars that had once supported a pair of handsome gates, and the sheep browsed close beneath the dim latticed windows.

"It seems like the end of the world to me to-night," thought Mr. Tredethlyn; "and yet once it was comfortable and homelike enough, when I sat with Susy of a night by the fire in the kitchen, while she darned the old man's gray worsted stockings. And to think that he had such oceans of money all that time, and yet seemed almost to grudge his only child every gown she wore and every bit of bread she put into her mouth." He was close to the familiar threshold by this time. He knocked at a low, narrow door in the neighborhood of the one dimly lighted window, and then drew back a few paces, looking up at the old-fashioned casements.

"There is the window of Susy's room," he thought. How black and dark it looks to-night! I remember coming up here the night before I ran away to Falmouth to enlist. I remember standing by the low wall yonder, in the cold autumnal night, looking up at that very window; there was a light burning there, and I thought of how I should see it burning just the same when I came back, and how I'd throw a handful of earth up at the old window, and Susy would look out, startled and wondering, to find her faithful sweetheart come back to her from the end of the world. And now it's this place that seems like the end of the world, somehow, and I'm every bit as far from Susy now as ever I was out yonder."

The door was opened only a very little way, and a woman's face, so hard and angular that it seemed almost to cut into the dusky atmosphere, peered out at the traveller.

"What do you please to want, sir?" she asked, suspiciously. "I want to ask you a few questions, Martha Dryscoll. I've come from the antipodes to ask them."

"Mr. Tredethlyn!" cried the woman, opening the door to its widest extent; "Mr. Francis Tredethlyn come home to his own like a ghost in the night! I make so bold as to bid you welcome, sir. Your uncle's empty chair stands ready for you. The house seems strange and lonesome without him."

It was not everybody who would have ascribed to Mr. Oliver Tredethlyn the power to enliven any house with the smallest ray of cheerfulness, or brighten any fireside with so much as the faintest glimmer of light. But Martha Dryscoll spoke in all good faith. She had believed in her master, and had worked for him, and pinched for him, and half starved herself and other people for his sake, throughout five-and-thirty years of the dreariest and hardest life that woman ever endured. He had picked her up, starved and almost dying, upon a high road near one of his outlying farms, and had taken her from field labor and all its attendant pains to be his housekeeper and—slave; and she had repaid this favor a thousandfold by a devotion that knew no weariness, and a rigid economy that extended itself to the saving of a grain of salt in the old spindleg-legged leaden salt-cellars.

Oliver Tredethlyn had not been actuated by any Quixotic motive in this eccentric choice of a servant. He took his housekeeper from the wayside because he saw in her a stuff he had vainly sought in the pampered menials who had hitherto presented themselves to his notice. He had been attracted to Martha in the first instance by her gaunt face and gaunter figure, which would have been sufficiently alarming in one of King Frederick William's chosen grenadiers. He had been attracted still more by her curt answers to his curt questions, in which she told him that she had walked thirty miles that day before lying down, as she believed, to die; that she had walked twenty miles the day before, and five-and-twenty the day before that; that she had not tasted food for the last eight-and-forty hours; and that she had worked in the fields and lived upon an average of twopence a day ever since she could remember.

It was upon this that a bargain was struck between Oliver Tredethlyn, of Tredethlyn Grange, of the one part, and Martha Auybody, of the other part, for the poor creature had no knowledge of any special surname to which she might lay claim. She had been called Carrot Jane in one place, because her hair was red and her name was not Jane. She had been called Gawky Bet, and Lanky Poll at other places, on account of her abnormal height; but the name she had received in the Union where her earlier years had been passed was Martha, and it was this name which she herself recognized as her legitimate appellation. She went home with Oliver Tredethlyn in one of his empty wagons, and ate her first spare meal in the Grange kitchen before nightfall: and from that hour until the old man's death she served him well and faithfully. She lived with him all the days of his bachelorhood, and resignedly united herself to his bailiff when he commanded her so to do. This faithful creature welcomed Mr. Tredethlyn's wife when he took it into his head to bring home a small tenant farmer's pretty daughter, who had been forced into a marriage with a man whom she detested; and, faithful and untiring to the last, this rough-handed brawny-armed servant watched by the young wife's sick-bed during those dull years in which she slowly withered, and faded, from a fresh, blooming girl into a prematurely old woman, and so sank by lingering stages into an early grave, leaving behind her one only child, whose infancy and girlhood were brightened by no softer light than such as might be shed from the grim, grenadier-like affection of Martha Dryscoll.

Jonathan Dryscoll, the farm bailiff whom Oliver Tredethlyn had desired his housekeeper to marry, was ten years younger than his wife, and was so poor and weak a creature morally and physically in her hands, that he seemed at least half a century her junior. If she told him to do anything, he did it. If she told him to think anything, he thought it: or would have done so, if the mental exercise had not been generally beyond the scope of his faculties. He was as honest and faithful as Martha herself: but if Martha had told him to go and fire all the ricks on Oliver Tredethlyn's property, he would have done it with the blind trustfulness of a princess in a child's story book, who obeys the eccentric behests of a fairy godmother. That Martha Dryscoll could do anything wrong or think anything wrong was an hypothesis which Jonathan her husband had never contemplated. Perhaps the pleasantest thing about this couple was that there was no disagreeable evidence of Martha's authority. Indeed, that worthy woman was most punctilious in respect to her liege lord and husband, whom she always spoke of as "the master." Jonathan obeyed and trembled, but the sceptre which his wife wielded was an invisible one, and the chains that bound her slave were as impalpable ble as if they had been fashioned of cobwebs.

Martha Dryscoll was not renowned for her capacity of expressing any species of emotion; but some faint ray of pleasure kindled in her grim face as she conducted Francis Tredethlyn through the kitchen to an apartment that had served as a kind of state chamber for three generations of his race. She set the candle on the polished mahogany table, and, folding her arms, contemplated the new master of the Grange at her leisure. In that dim light, in her quaint, scanty dress, with a brown background of oaken wainscot behind her, she looked like a homely figure in one of Jan Steen's pictures, a hard-faced, angular housewife, honest, laborious, and economical, with her ear perpetually open to the leaking of beer-barrels, or the boiling over of soup-kettles, her eye ever on the alert to perceive waste or destruction.

"I wish you welcome, Mr. Tredethlyn," she said; and then, with something like sadness in her tone, "If the money was to go away from her, better that it should go to you than to strangers. I don't think you'd turn your back upon her, if she was to need your help; would you now, Mr. Francis?"

"Turn my back upon her?" cried the young man—"turn my back upon my cousin Sasy! Do you think I want the money that ought to have been hers. With God's blessing, I will go to the end of the world to find my poor little girl. But tell me—tell me all about it, Martha. I know you are a good creature. I know you were fond of Susan, though you seemed hard and stern, like the old man. Tell me all you know about my lost cousin, and don't fear but I'll make good use of my knowledge."

"It isn't much I have to tell, sir," answered the housekeeper, very gravely. "You remember old Mr. Restwick of Pen Gorbald. Folks say that he's almost as rich as our master was. However it is, he and master was always fast friends, and when Mrs. Restwick had been dead a little over a twelvemonth, he and master seemed to get friendlier than ever, and was always laying their heads together about something, old Restwick hanging about this place, and sitting in our kitchen, and in this very room—for master made quite a fuss with the old man, and would sit in the parlor on his account—all the summer time. Miss Susan usen't to like the old man, but she daredn't say as much, seeing as he was her father's friend. Heaven as looks down upon me knows, Mr. Francis, that the real reason of old Restwick pottering about our place night after night never came into my head, no more than if it had been so much Greek or Latin. But one night—one quiet summer evening, after such a day as to-day—the truth came out all at once; and it came upon Susan Tredethlyn as it came upon me—like a thunderbolt. Can you guess what it was, Mr. Francis?"

"No!" exclaimed the young man, staring at Martha Dryscoll with a bewildered expression on his face.

"Nor any one else, Mr. Francis, that wasn't so wrapped up in the love of his money that the very heart inside of him had turned to stuff as hard as his golden guineas, or harder; for there's some kind of furnace as will melt them—isn't there, Mr. Francis? On the night I am telling you of, my master told Susan the meaning of old Restwick's visits. She was to marry him—poor, pretty young thing. He'd promise to make such and such—settlements—I think master called 'em, and she'd be mistress of Pen Gorbald farm, and one of the richest women in this part of the country. The poor dear only gave one shriek, Mr. Francis, and fell down upon the floor at her father's feet as white and as quiet as a corpse."

"The hard-hearted villain!" cried Francis, pacing up and down the room. "The infernal villain!"

"She didn't lie there long; she wasn't let to do that. Mr. Tredethlyn lifted her up by the arm, and set her on her feet, fierce and savage-like; and when she opened her eyes and looked about her, all stupefied and bewildered, he began to talk to her. It was cruel talk to hear from a father to his child; it was a cruel sight to see her trembling and shivering, and only held from falling by his hard hand clenched upon her arm. I tried to interfere between them, Mr. Francis, but my master let his daughter drop into a chair, and pushed me out of the room. Me and Jonathan was sleeping in the room over the stables then, and Mr. Tredethlyn took me by the shoulders, and put me out of the door that opens from the kitchen into the stone yard at back. I heard the door bolted against me, and I knew I could be no help or comfort to that poor child all night. The door's thick, but I could just hear Susan Tredethlyn's sobs now and then, like as if they'd been blown towards me on the winds, and her father's voice speaking loud and stern; I listened till all seemed quiet, and I was in hopes his heart was softened towards her. But when I got up at four o'clock next morning—for it was harvest time and we were very busy—Susan Tredethlyn's room was empty, and the front door was unlocked and unbolted. She'd run away, Mr. Francis; she'd let herself out some time in the night, and run away. There was a little scrap of a shawl she used to wear hanging to the latch of the door. That was bad news for me to tell my master, Mr. Francis, but I had to tell it. He turned white, and glared at me for a minute just like a wild beast, and there was a choking, gurgling kind of noise in his throat. But he was as quiet after that one minute as if he had been made of iron. 'So much the better, Mrs. Dryscoll,' he said; 'an undutiful daughter isn't worth the meat she eats.'"

"But he went after her," said Francis; "surely he made some attempt to bring her back? He didn't let a poor ignorant girl go out into the world without a friend—without a sixpence?"

"She had a little money, Mr. Francis. Her father had given her a sovereign on her birthday every year for the last ten years, making her promise, to save the money. She had saved the money, for she had no chance to spend it, poor child; and she took that money with her, for when I looked about her room, I missed the little box she used to keep it in. As to me, Mr. Francis, I'm but a poor ignorant country woman, that never learned to read and write till I was getting on for thirty; but I got my husband to go to Falmouth with an advertisement for the county paper, saying as 'S. T.' was to remember she had a true friend in M. D., and was to be sure and write to her whenever she wanted help.' I daredn't say more, sir, and I think when master saw that advertisement he knew what it meant, for he glared at me across the paper, just as he glared at me when I told him his daughter was gone."

"And he never relented—he never softened towards that poor unhappy girl?"

"For three years, sir, he never mentioned her name. Night after night he'd sit and write, and make out his accounts, and sum up his receipts, and calculate his profits, and such like, and he'd talk to me fast enough about the business of the farm; but he never spoke his daughter's name. One day he got a letter, directed in her hand. I took it from the postman at Landresdale myself, one afternoon when I was down there marketing, and I wrote down the postmark that was on it, but that was all I ever knew of the letter. When my master saw the hand, he came over all of a tremble like, and there was something awful in the sight of that stern old man trembling and shivering like as if he'd been stricken by the palsy; but he got over it in a minute, and read the letter, me watching him all the time. If his face had been stone it couldn't have told less. He crumpled up the letter and put it in his pocket, and for three months he never spoke of that, nor of his daughter. Yet I knew somehow that he thought of her; for a kind of change came over him, and he seemed always brooding, brooding, brooding; and he'd start up all of a sudden when we was all sitting of a night quiet in this kitchen—he'd start up as if he was going right away, and then leave a long sigh and sit down again. But he never said anything about what was in his thoughts, till one morning he came to me, and said very quietly, 'Pack me some clothes in a carpet-bag, Mrs. Dryscoll. I'm going to London to look for my daughter.' My husband and him went on foot down to Landresdale to catch the Falmouth coach; but our master never came back. The next news as we heard of him, Mr. Francis, came to us a month after he'd left. It was a letter from the lawyers to say as Mr. Oliver Tredethlyn was dead."

"And is that all?"

"Yes, Mr. Francis; I can tell you no more. My master was a good master to me, and I served him faithfully, and worked hard to save his money. But things have all seemed to come before me in a new light since that night when I saw Susan Tredethlyn fall white and cold at her father's feet, and him without pity for her. It seems as if I'd been stone blind up to that time, Mr. Francis; and my eyes was opened all of a sudden; and I saw that we'd been all wicked heathens, making an idol out of money that had never brought happiness or comfort to any living creature; least of all to ourselves. I saw it all at once that night, Mr. Francis, and I knew that our lives had been wrong somehow."

Martha Dryscoll spoke very earnestly. She was a good woman, after her own manner; eager to do her duty to her uttermost, grateful for small favors, faithful and affectionate. A noble heart beat in that grenadier-like form, a gentle spirit looked out of those hard, gray eyes. She told the story of her young mistress's flight with a sorrowful solemnity, undisturbed by tears. Perhaps her hard childhood, her bitter youth, her joyless middle life had dried up the source of that tender womanly emotion; for Martha Dryscoll had never been seen by living witness to shed a tear. She unlocked a grum-looking work-box, and took from it a little pocket-book, out of which she tore a leaf.

"That's the name that was on the post-mark, Mr. Francis," she said, handing the paper to Mr. Tredethlyn.

The young man read the word Coltonsloough.

"Coltonsloough," he repeated, "I never heard of a place of that name. But I'll find it if it's the most obscure spot upon the earth. God bless you, Martha Dryscoll, for I believe you are a good woman."

He held out his hand, and grasped the housekeeper's bony fingers as he spoke.

"We've been awaiting—me and the master—for orders from you as to what he was to do, sir. We're ready to serve you faithful, if you want our service; but we're ready to leave the old place, if we're any burden upon you. You'll be coming to settle here, maybe."

"No," answered Tredethlyn, with something of a shudder.

"If I'd found Susan here, as I once thought to find her, I should have been glad enough to settle somewhere in these parts. As it is, there's something in the place that gives the heartache, and I doubt if I shall ever come near it again. Whatever wages you and your husband had in my uncle's time shall be doubled from to-night, Mrs. Dryscoll; and if my cousin Susan is still alive, and should ever find her way back to this place, I should like her to see a light burning in the old window, and to find a faithful friend ready to bid her welcome home."

Francis Tredethlyn did not linger very long in the house where a great part of his boyhood had been spent. Martha's husband came in presently, smelling very strongly of cow-house and stable, and the two would fain have given Mr. Tredethlyn a detailed account of their stewardship; but the young man had no heart to listen to them. What did it matter to him that he was the poorer by the death of an Alderney cow on the pasture farm down in the valley, or the richer by a great sheep-shearing season on the hill. He came home to find no creature of his kith or kin. He stood as much alone in the world as Adam before Eve was created to bear him company; and he felt very lonely and desolate in spite of his thirty thousand a year.

He walked back to Landresdale across the bleak moorland under the summer night. Away in the distance he saw the dark expanse of purple ocean melting imperceptibly into purple sky; and vague and dim as that shadowy distance seemed the unknown future that lay before him. He slept at the "Crown," and left Landresdale early the next morning by the Falmouth coach, journeying Londonward; but he had by no means abandoned his search for Susan Tredethlyn.

The death-watch (Anobium stratum) is a very common inmate of houses. Among those who are unacquainted with the habits of insects, there is a common superstition that the strange ticking sound often heard in old houses is a sign of approaching death. The noise, however, is caused by a small beetle which, during its boring operation, rubs the neck and thorax (chest) together, by which means this, to some persons, terrible omen, is produced—a fact which, if more generally known, would save a world of causeless anxiety and uneasiness. In the lava state these insects do a great injury to furniture and the woodworks of old houses, which they gnaw continually. When captured, this beetle feigns death with the strangest pertinacity, preferring, it is said, to suffer under a slow fire rather than to betray the least sign of vitality. The death-watch, on account of its retired habits, minute size and dark color, is very seldom seen; and as there are often several individuals working at the same time in their boring operations, the sound seems to proceed simultaneously from opposite directions, thus adding to the superstitious error wherewith by some persons it is regarded. The greatest evil, however, to be dreaded from it is the injury it does through its excavations in the woodwork of houses. It is not larger than a good sized flea.

COL. CAMPBELL, in his Indian Journal, tells a story of an old woman named Kate Carmichael, who made her living by distilling "the water of life," and looked upon George III., who then ruled the land, much in the same light as a modern Pole looks upon the Emperor of Russia—as a ruthless tyrant, who would not allow honest people to manufacture their own grain after own fashion—and devoutly prayed for his death accordingly. At last the news of the old King's demise reached the Highlands, and Kate, rejoicing in the death of the tyrant, immediately set her still to work, in her own house, and in broad daylight. The natural consequence was an early visit from the exciseman, who claimed the still as a lawful prize.

Kate did not see this; so, seizing a pitchfork which lay ready to her hand, she drove him into a corner, and kept him at bay, while she shouted to her neighbors for assistance, exclaiming: "Kill his brains; stick the rascal. There's nae law noo; the King's deed!"

Her idea was that, the moment the King died, all law, as far as Highlanders were concerned, ceased; and her neighbors being pretty much of the same mind, the exciseman was thrashed within an inch of his life, and the still rescued.

"AXE GRINDING" is a term borrowed from one of the most charming stories told by Benjamin Franklin. A little boy going to school was accosted by a man carrying an axe. The man calls the boy all kinds of pretty and endearing names, and induces him to enter a yard where there is a grindstone. "Now, my pretty little fellow," says he with the axe, "only turn that handle and you'll see something very pretty." The boy turns and turns, and the man holds the axe to the stone and pours water over it until the axe is ground. Straightway he turns with strident voice and fierce gesture on the boy: "You abandoned little miscreant," he cries, "what do you mean by playing truant from school? You deserve a good thrashing. Get you gone, sirrah, this instant?" "And after this," adds Franklin, "when anybody flattered me I always thought he had an axe to grind."

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1864.

A PLEASANT STATE OF THINGS.

ON the principle that "bad news is better than no news," and that even the worst certainty is preferable to suspense, we imagine that no one will seriously dispute the assertion that "a pleasant state of things" is rapidly coming to obtain in this city. Indeed, we are not sure that the period is not already reached. Formerly, when a man sat down to count his money or tie his shoes, it was somewhat problematical whether he would be knocked in the head or not—now the odds are in favor of such a consummation occurring. Formerly when a housewife put away her silver spoons, or a goldsmith locked his shop and stepped out to lunch, there was some uncertainty about the one finding her silver in its place when her next tea party was given, or the other finding his goods on his shelves when he returned from his half-hour's absence. That day, however, has gone by. It is now understood that eternal vigilance is the price of life and property, and that a forfeit is sure to be paid if that vigilance be for one moment relaxed.

Store-keepers now view their customers with a certain air of suspicion, and adopt precautions if an unfamiliar face appears. Traders in jewelry and fine gold no longer lock their places of business and go out when they want lunch, but carry their lunches with them to their stores, in tin-pails, and when noontime comes spread them on their counters, keeping careful eyes on their shelves and show-cases the while they eat. True, the merchant has not yet adopted the practice of covering a stranger with a pistol the moment one enters the store, and showing him the goods with one hand while maintaining an attitude of armed neutrality with the other, but that such a practice will soon prevail is highly probable. For self-preservation is one of nature's first laws, and no one can dispute that some such custom is necessary under the era of violence which seems to have been inaugurated.

There is a certain romance about the boldness of our criminals which invests them with an interest scarcely second to that which hovers around the memoirs and memories of those great lights of Newgate who head the Calendar and figure so conspicuously in yellow-covered literature and sensational plays. The purloining of a handkerchief or the taking of money surreptitiously from a till have no flavor of the heroic and move only contempt, but the way that these latter-day villainies are done wins for the action a certain admiration. The murder of the woman Freschi in Waverly Place was boldly, thoroughly, and artistically done. The neighborhood was a frequented one, the police had it under careful surveillance, and people passed and repassed through the streets at all hours. Under all these discouraging circumstances, however, the murder was perpetrated so successfully as to make it remarkable in the annals of crime. Not a thing did the murderer leave behind him to give a clue to his identity or his whereabouts; no breath of life did he leave in his victim's body that she might murmur his name or description in the ears of justice. Not content with beating in her head he made assurance doubly sure and took a bond of fate by cutting her throat with a chisel. Apparently there was no hurry about the proceeding, evidently the thing was as coolly as it was thoroughly done. And so of the almost parallel murder in Stout's Alley, where a woman of the same class was killed in a similar way, with the exception in the latter instance of the throat being cut with a case-knife instead of a chisel. The result was the same, however, and the murderer has reaped the reward of his dexterity in the immunity which has so far accompanied the crime.

The affair of the pawnbroker's boy on Commercial street revealed a degree of boldness which would do credit to the leader of a forlorn hope in a desperate cause. While the three balls over the door were swinging and glittering in the broad light of noonday, the operator entered the shop, felled the attendant to the floor with a nervous and well directed blow, left the shop with his booty, and to the time of the present writing has not been heard from. In the manner and time of its perpetration this affair was somewhat analogous to the Malden murder, being unlike it only in the weapon used and the fact that the robber escaped detection. It is really much to be regretted that our criminals have adopted this system of "no cards," for unless they learn their names and addresses it seems next to impossible for our policemen to find them.

In the last case of an assault with a view to murder and robbery, particulars of which will be found among the local events of the week, the operator did not fare so well as did the ones in the previous instances. Failing to make a sure thing of it with the first blow, his victim gave the alarm and citizens secured Mr. Fitzmorris before his aspirations were completed. To the end of his life Mr. Fitzmorris will probably regret that he did not strike a little more vigorously, since it is plain that had the pen-maker been stunned or killed by the first blow he would have succeeded in making his escape and might perhaps have been enabled to set up in the gold-pen business in the very vicinity of the City Hall. If Mr. Fitzmorris ever have another chance to operate—and it is probable that the clemency of the courts or the lenity of the executor will furnish him one—we venture to say that he will do his work too completely to even be caught by citizens, let alone the chance of being detected and captured by a policeman.

We do not wish to be captious, but really we cannot avoid remarking that this state of things, pleasant as it is, has gone on long enough. If asked to suggest a remedy we hardly know what plan would flow from our pen. In some countries when a crime is committed and the criminal is not detected, on the principle that something ought to be done, they guillotine a gendarme or bow-string a janizary. But aside from the fact that we had rather see policemen promenading the streets than dangling by their necks in the Plaza, we have another reason for protesting against the adoption of any such summary though impartial code, for our policemen are not much encouraged in the pursuit of criminals, the law generally managing to let them slip in some way through its easy fingers, even after its ministers have caught them. Very many murders have been committed in this city and county during the past two years, but we have yet to chronicle the first execution. Some one remarks that hanging a man is the poorest use to which you can put him, but it yet remains to be demonstrated to us that the murderer can be put to any better. Experience has proven that the surest way of preventing crime is to make its punishment swift and certain. Very few men would commit murder if certain that their lives would pay the penalty; but when in addition to the uncertainty of being caught they have the chance of escape from the spoken penalty of the law even if they are, the temptation in some minds to gratify revenge or cupidity becomes too strong to be resisted. In all the cases that have come before the court lately, even where foul and deliberate murder was proven, the punishment of the criminals was commuted. How would it do to somewhat balance the account in the present instance by hanging Mr. Fitzmorris? If we do not hang the assassin when he kills his victim, would it not be somewhat in accordance with the fitness of things to hang him when he does not?

LADIES' DRESS.

ONLY a few out of the great number of ladies one chances to see in the street, seem to dress with any regard to a correct standard of taste. First, as to the colors of their attire, they appear to have no idea of a harmony or agreeable assemblage of tints. You will observe a lady, for example, dressed in a blue silk bonnet garnished with a red flower, a scarlet shawl daubed with green spots, and gown of some neutral tint, but marked strongly with pink and purple streaks. The object in dressing in this guise, would seem to be the bringing together as many staring colors as possible—a bit of blue, red, green, yellow, pink, orange, or anything else which will make a dash and look pretty. Pretty is the only standard; a pretty bonnet, a pretty shawl, a pretty gown, etc.; let it be only pretty, and that is quite enough. Thus, when things are bought separately, although each may look tolerably well by itself, the whole will probably make up a most fantastic assemblage of colors, and really render the wearer ridiculous. If we should be permitted to offer an advice upon the very delicate matter of lady's dress, we should, by all means, recommend the adoption of simple, not flashy, colors. A high-toned color is always dangerous; it may be quite at variance with the complexion, and at least cannot easily be suited to other parts of the attire. Ladies of a swarthy complexion should on no account attempt blues, lavenders, or any other violent colors; the most suitable or becoming for them are whites, or any of the broken light tints. Sky-blue and pea-green are the most trying colors which can be worn. We have been told by manufacturers that they prepare dresses of certain colors for certain towns. In one town there is a demand for high-colored goods, and in another these goods could scarcely find a purchaser, but the demand would be nearly all for neutral tints; in other words, the ladies in one exercise a coarse indiscriminate taste, and in the other, they are more refined in judgment.

The next point worth hinting at, though, after all, it is not of the least use, is the very small degree of taste exercised in making the dress suitable to the figure. The standard followed in this department is mere fashion. It is quite amusing to see how this ideal standard of perfection is worshipped, and how it drags poor worshippers after it. Be a lady tall or short, lean or dumpy, she must dress herself exactly like her neighbors, no matter what be their stature or figure. A short woman, of course, should dress in such a manner as would seemingly add to her height, and not wear flounces, which only help to make her look more short. But if it be fashionable to surround the gown with flounces, then flounces the poor little dumpy woman must of course put on in all their plenitude. If, on the other hand, the lady be somewhat too tall, and would wish to shorten her appearance, she finds her case equally irremediable, in consequence of a peculiarity in the fashion for the time being. The lady who is already too broad across the shoulders, must make herself still more broad, by means of a pair of huge sleeves, which project like a pair of bellows. But if the fashion suddenly change, and a narrow-shouldered lady wish to keep up the reign of broad sleeves, she is compelled to retrench their exuberance, and submit to the new order of things. One lady in some part of the world—the Empress of the French perhaps—has reasons for concealing the outline of her figure, and hoops come into fashion all the world over. The fat lady is obliged to don them and in consequence the graceful incumbrance of the elephant; anon the fashion changes, and then the thin lady has to stand before scoffers like a lath. One lady has pretty feet and loops up her dress whenever she happens in the street, whether the pavement and crossings be muddy or not. Again, a leader of fashion, with the view of covering a pair of bad ankles, sets the fashion of long gowns trailing in the mud, and all ladies at once lengthen their skirts, and trail their gowns in the mud also. No matter how absurd is the taste set by this ideal being, the leader of fashion, it is sure to be followed with all convenient speed. One or two cunning milliners, in connection with a lady of ton—generally a young lady of some consequence just come out—have it in their power, by a magic whisk of their needle, to set any fashion they please. To the command of these nameless and mercenary female traders, the lady population of the whole city yield a ready and expensive obedience. Whether the order be to lengthen or shorten, to widen or narrow, the attire, it is punctually obeyed. A few may grumble at the change, but the change is made. Oh, ladies, ladies, how much your fate is to be commiserated!

THE NEW DIRECTORY.—We are indebted to H. C. Langley for a copy of the new "San Francisco Directory," bearing on its back the figures 1864-65. A due regard for truth will not allow us to say that it is the most entertaining book that has been laid on our table during the present season, but we are constrained to say that it is the most useful one. It is desirable to know where one's debtors live in order to be able to find them; it is convenient to know for a certainty where creditors have their habitation, so that one can escape them. In this Directory of Mr. Langley's we have not only this desirable information, but a great deal other as well. It has been made a sort of handbook of the city, furnishing a guide and map by which a stranger could not possibly get lost—even with the aid of a policeman—and telling the rates of fare that hackmen are entitled to charge, the whereabouts of engine-houses, hotels and other places of popular resort, what the municipal ordinances are, and much else that is useful and entertaining. As a compiler of Directories we think that Mr. Langley is the peer of any in the Union, for certainly his work is excelled by none while it furnishes a pattern to many. He commenced the enterprise and continued it when his labors met with no remuneration at all; we are glad to learn that his work now yields him that financial reward which he so richly merits.

THE RAINS have been general and abundant throughout the State; our exchanges all attest the visitation: Several localities were in imminent danger, for a few days, of a repetition of the scenes of deluge and desolation of 1861-'2. Of course most anxiety was felt and most inquiry directed as to "the situation" at Sacramento, Stockton and other places heretofore flooded. It is gratifying to know that their levees proved sufficient for their protection. In fact, while our interior contemporaries admit a somewhat unusual dampness, they charge most of the "danger" to the account of an undue inclination on the part of reporters for the San Francisco press to write a general obituary for everything and everybody outside this metropolis. The promise of a coming season of prosperity to miners and agriculturists, however, should—now that the skies are bright and the fears of a general overflow are banished—remove local jealousies and fill us all with confidence and hope.

CORRECTION.—In a paragraph last week referring to Miss Florence James, a slight mistake was made in stating that she was an assistant in the "Kindergarten" school of Prof. Miel. A department for young ladies is connected with the Professor's establishment, and of this Miss James has charge, numbering in her class, we believe, ladies who have reached the extreme verge of years to which the adjective prefix can properly be made to apply. The "Kindergarten" department is the children's, and over this the Professor presides, assisted in its conduct by his wife. We make this correction the more explicit as it is not generally known that Prof. Miel's school has a department for young ladies.

NEW BOOKS.

THE house of Roman sends us the following late works: Autobiography of Lieut.-Gen. Scott; Familiar Letters from Europe, by Prof. Felton; Love and Duty, by Mrs. Hubbard; Melbourne House, by the author of The Wide World and The Nasby Papers.

The Autobiography of Gen. Scott will find thousands of readers, for there will be a very natural curiosity on all sides to see how the hero of an hundred battles will demean himself in print. We apprehend that the veteran in this experiment in literature was moved not so much by an ambition of seeing himself in print as by a desire to set his record right before the country whose flag he so victoriously carried. For it was the author's misfortune to become somewhat connected with political life, and necessarily he suffered the usual consequences—calumny and vexation. The story of his life is told in the first person, changing occasionally to the third when the modesty of the narrator makes it necessary. Commencing with his boyhood, the narrative carries us through all the shifting scenes of the old hero's eventful life. The account of the Mexican campaign is particularly interesting, as the version of one who moved and breathed in the smoke of its battles, as well as directed them; but of the present war little is said beyond mention of the suggestions which the author offered when the clouds first began gathering above the horizon—suggestions for the garrisoning of the Southern ports, full of practical wisdom, which should have been adopted. It is a little curious that General Scott should have voluntarily placed himself in that position which Job wished that his enemy should occupy; and that one who has so often reviewed armies should now come to be reviewed in turn by every subaltern in literature.

Melbourne House is one of those quiet domestic tales by which the authoresses of Queechy and The Wide World have attained their popularity. It is Edgeworthy, without having much edge to it, coaching us along through two volumes in an easy and leisurely way. Its chief merit is the moral sentiment and home tastes which it inculcates and encourages; its chief drawback is the length to which the lesson is spun out. We know not why it is that most authors and all authoresses think that they are making a match against time and space, and that all that is required of them is to come within the bounds of both—certain it is that they never annihilate either. If going to Calistoga or to Napa to spend a month, a man could afford to take Melbourne House along, and ladies who have little to do will find the two volumes pleasant companions enough in the city.

And what has been said of Melbourne House will apply very well to Love and Duty, with the exception that Mrs. Hubbard's work is in one volume instead of two. The publishers would like the notice to say more, and accordingly furnish a printed slip which accompanies the book. This it is:

We cannot praise too highly the power and truthfulness with which the characters of this story are represented, it is one of the class of novels to which the reader turns with delight after reading some of the trash that is put forth from the press. It abounds in soul-elevating thoughts, and no person can read it without being made wiser and better thereby. It is full of simple and naive wisdom, shrewd delineation of character in great variety, and it has a piquancy that rivets the attention even amidst simple incidents. The characters are drawn by a hand which can realize fictitious characters with minute intensity, and the novel stands out much in the same way as "Jane Eyre" did. Price $1.50 in paper, or $2.00 in cloth. Published by T. B. Peterson & Brothers, Philadelphia, Penn. It is an excellent production, and we cordially commend it to our readers.

They say they would "be much pleased and esteem it a great favor" if we "would notice this novel as its merits deserve, or copy the above notice." We have complied with the latter request, and have endeavored to do the other thing as well. But we protest against being made responsible for the assertion that the work cannot be too highly praised, and as to "some of the trash that is put forth from the press," this book seems a very fair specimen of what publishers find it to their interest to print. Neither can we conscientiously say that Love and Duty "stands out much in the same way that Jane Eyre did," for we do not know how that lady stood out, though it is presumable that if she wore hoops she stood out pretty well; that Love and Duty ought to stand forth always we are ready enough to admit.

Of Professor Felton's Familiar Letters from Europe, our lady correspondent writing from New York speaks in a manner which fairly illustrates the old adage that "Familiarity breeds contempt." A glance over the pages of the book leads us to set it down as a chatty lot of letters, scarcely marked by the close observation and keen analysis of men and manners which one would expect at the pen of a "Harvard Don."

The Nasby Papers is a collection of newspaper contributions that would be humorous were it not for the distorted orthography which is made their prominent feature. Tricks with syntax and spelling is simply making faces in print, and we should as soon think of styling the man who grins through a hoop a "humorist" as the one who thus grins through the broken bars of grammar. All the fun of the thing has long since been exhausted, and we are heartily sick of it, not to say disgusted.

We are indebted to Mr. Flood for Volume I. of The Works of Archbishop Hughes, comprising his sermons, letters, lectures, speeches, etc. The compilation is by Lawrence Kehoe. The life of an erudite scholar, an accomplished orator and a distinguished leader of the Catholic masses in this country, cannot fail to be interesting, while his letters and speeches are well worthy of study. Archbishop Hughes has never been greatly identified with politics, but since the breaking out of the present war his efforts, both in this country and in Europe, (whither he went at the instigation of Government,) have been given to the Union cause. His services in quelling the New York riots of last year will long be gratefully remembered.

OUR NEW YORK LETTER.

[FROM THE CALIFORNIAN'S LADY CORRESPONDENT.]

NEW YORK, November 3d, 1864.

THE new edition in blue and gold of Hawthorne's Twice Told Tales, is the first coinage since his death of that immortality which stamps him as one of the Elect. What fame is to Milton in Paradise, to Shakspeare with the "Mighty Mother," and to other men of genius obscure, unsung, unappreciated in their mortal lives, that will it now be to Hawthorne, the finest, clearest, most subtle author America has given birth to. The preface to these volumes is a profound and touching history of the first part of his literary life. For ten or twelve years, the years of his young manhood, not the slightest impression was made on the public by these stories. "Throughout the time specified," he says, "he had no incitement to literary effort in a reasonable prospect of reputation or profit; nothing but the pleasure itself of composition, an enjoyment not at all amiss in its way, and perhaps essential to the merit of the work in hand, but which in the long run, will hardly keep the chill out of a writer's heart or numbness out of his fingers." Upon me, this preface has the effect, which his own criticism of the tales denies to his readers, "that the merriest man can hardly contrive to laugh at his broadest humor; the tenderest woman, one would suppose, will hardly shed tears at his deepest pathos." I feel keenly the sharp, delicate sarcasm, which compels a silent laugh, and I am touched to tears at the manly, unaffected, plain narrative of his obscurity. He really describes himself, when he says that he came to be regarded as a "mild, sly, gentle, melancholic, exceedingly sensitive and not very forcible man;" but he does not say that his shyness and reserve were the bane of his existence. He believed that the curse came upon him because of the solitude and isolation of his early life. But a man's habits cannot belie his temperament, unless he is under physical restraint, and Hawthorne's idiosyncrasy was all his own, much as he disliked it. At his funeral in Concord, some of his fellow-townsmen were present who had never seen him alive, and who went with the object of seeing him dead. His walks were never in their familiar ways, but were confined to his own premises and a lane which was near his house. Edward Dicey, in a long article in one of the English magazines, has best described Hawthorne's mental idiosyncrasies. He saw the two sides and opposites of conflicting circumstances and opinions so clearly that he suffered a continual vacillation of will. His insight made him intellectually irresolute as Hamlet was. This trait is not evident as vacillation, in his writings, but it pervaded his life, preventing him from being a man of action. He had a horror of radicalism, and it was his fortune to be connected with two well-known radicals by marriage—one of them the wife of a well-known school reformer and a partner in his moral enterprises, and the other a strong-minded lady, immensely "sound," the getter up of the Kindergarten system, a writer in big magazines, good and useful generally, but theoretically unpleasant to Hawthorne. The character of the minister in "The Scarlet Letter," apparently elaborated in moral sympathy against the social crime committed by him, shows the revolt of Hawthorne's soul against the suppression of the natural. It is the best plea against moral coercion, still on the rampage in New England, ever written. It is pleasant to be able to give personal testimony to the truly genial taste and friendliness which he showed to authors younger and more obscure than himself. One of my best possessions is a letter which I received from him at a time when sympathy and recognition were desirable. I had launched a cock-boat upon the stream of literature, and it was in danger of being run down by vessels of heavy tonnage, the bulwarks of our intellectual brine; for in their estimation, or rather the estimation of some rear-admiral, it lacked the ballast used by them—the ballast called morals. It tottled on the tide before them in an audacious dance—not quite up to Holbein's "Dance of Death"—and Hawthorne from his argosy flung out a signal which displayed, with the kindest phrases, this: "Your morals may be safely left to take care of themselves."

When the poem of The King's Bell was published, he wrote the author, commenting on the story, which was taken in part from Doran's Monarchs Retired from Business, and which relates that a young king on the day he ascended the throne ordered a bell to be hung in his palace, which he should ring whenever he was happy. It is needless to say that the bell was never rung. The king came the nearest to a peal from it the day he died; with his last breath he stretched forth his hand towards the cord, but it left him before he could touch it, and the bell was silent forever. Hawthorne, the saddest writer, wrote: "I wish the idea had not been quite so sad. I think Felix might have rung the bell once in his life-time, and again at the moment of death. Yet you may be right. I have been a happy man, and yet I do not remember any one moment of such happy, conspiring circumstances, that I could have rung a joy-bell over it." Later than this, he wrote a letter of commendation to Bayard Taylor when he published his first novel, and I have no doubt there are other young writers who possess like treasures of his pen. He admired Miss Prescott, and I believe told her so.

Mrs. Hawthorne is already engaged on a work of love and duty—the life and letters of her husband—which, of course, will be brought out by Ticknor & Fields.

Ticknor & Fields have also published the late Professor Felton's Familiar Letters from Europe, began in 1853. As they are familiar letters, perhaps they do not come within the province of the critic. As the work of a Harvard Don, it may be said that they do not rise above the commonplace. Here is a specimen of his style: "At Geneva we had several thunder-storms. I wish you would turn to Childe Harold and read his description of Lake Lemán in a calm and in a storm. We saw both to perfection." Professor Felton met Talfourd, Rogers and Humboldt, who have since joined that "innumerable caravan" whither the Professor has gone also.

Apocryphos of this, one of the last European mails brings the tidings of the death of the French hair-dresser poet, Jasmin, at the age of 66. Felton made his acquaintance in Paris, at the time he was there making acknowledgments for the prize he had received from the French Academy of 5,000 francs for his last volume of Las Papillotes. Jasmin wrote in the Gascon dialect, which is, in fact, (says Felton,) representative of the language of the Troubadours. In the intervals of hair-dressing, he wrote and recited his pieces to his countrymen, who were roused to enthusiasm by this poetical rendering of their daily life, and his fame spread. Felton found him a lion everywhere in Paris, and describes him as a child of nature, full of fire, with flashing eyes and varying voice. He recited his pieces in the theatres of Southern France, and filled them where even Rachel could not. But his exhibitions were all for charitable purposes, and the cities of the south vied with each other in bestowing honors on their poetical benefactor. Longfellow has translated one of his poems, "The Blind Girl of Castel-Cuille," and I have read an article upon him in Chambers's Miscellany—and this is all I have ever heard about Jasmin.

Another book in Ticknor's last batch is The Gipsies of the Danes' Dike, by G. S. Philipps, ("January Scarle.") It is a surprisingly capital story, and professes to be a literal reflex of wayside life in England, with fictitious characters, incidents and actions. It is so clever that I am sorry to say the author is an Englishman; but then if he had not been that, the book would not have been good, for the English are under the Star of Empire as far as the writing of fiction goes. I do not think that we can hold a kerosene lamp in comparison; even the meteoric bigamist, Miss Braddon, surpasses all the flash and fancy school in America. Speaking of kerosene reminds me of our modern order—the Petroleum Aristocracy. Shoddy aristocracy is ancient, consisting of the old-established families, whose habits have a venerable halo, which places them on a level with the more ancient and fishlike order of the Codfish Aristocracy which now can boast of a "dead grandfather." The campaign in the oil fields of Pennsylvania is quite as eventful as the martial or the election campaign, and the petroleum prospectuses in the newspapers quite as reliable, exciting and seductive, as the military and political prospectuses with which we are at present crammed.

Taking a bird's-eye view of the condition, I can hardly believe that this letter does not somewhere contain an ingenious Fraud. The arch-enemy has conquered us, if the rebels have not, and hangs out his banners on our inward and outward walls. Our women wear masses of false hair, twisted, braided and curled into stupendous edifices of wonderful gracelessness. We do not shed any more natural tears. I almost believe, there is alum, lime, cream of tartar and other deleterious substances mixed with the limpid fluid. When I walk in Broadway I am continually confounding the women who pass for real, with the wire figures draped with dry goods, that are placed at shop entrances and inside. The true form of men is entirely concealed by immensely wide trowsers. We cannot exclaim with Hamlet, "What a piece of work is a man!" He is so hidden, we know nothing about his likeness to a god. After the election, however, we may forsake our bogus ways and return to nature's paths; when the Sanitary Commission will not be accused of spending its gains to obtain "healthy" votes, when officers of every grade furloughed home to stump for President will go back to fight, when the inmates of hospitals having deposited their votes in weak spots will return to their wards—then, I repeat, we may once more become a virtuous community.

FOREIGN ITEMS.

FANCY DRESSES.—At the last of the brilliant private Carnival balls, the most striking of the dresses worn by the ladies was that of the Duchess de Morny, as an English lady of the last century. Princess Anna Murat, as a peacock, her train being of white tulle covered with "peacock's eyes," her petticoat of yellow satin, peacock's feathers in her breast and in the hair. Her ornaments were a band of magnificent emeralds and diamonds, worn from one shoulder to the waist, as Queen Victoria wears her royal ribbon—a necklace of the same and the aigrettes of peacock's plumes in her head confined by an immense brooch. It is said that the princess is frequently bedecked with the Empress' jewels; she is the only lady of the court on terms of absolute intimacy with her Majesty, whom she always addresses as "my aunt." Princess Tivabeskoï was dressed as a cat—cat's heads upon her bosom and sleeves, and in her hair; another lady as an aviary, with a lace dress covered with birds in real feathers—her head-dress consisting of a bird cage nearly six inches square in gilded wicker—a bird inside, with another perched upon her head. The bosom of her dress was covered with red berries; birds nestled upon her shoulders, and another wicker cage hung from her side, in which were several canaries. One lady represented photography—small photographic cards forming the trimming of her bertha; larger-sized ones formed the basque, still larger the trimming of the skirt, which was of white satin. The necklace was composed of very small pictures set in gold, and the ear-rings of likenesses of her hostess, the Duchess de Morny, also set in gold. The head-dress completed the eccentricity of this costume. It consisted of a camera, the front of which was a mirror instead of the ordinary glass. One of the most elegant dresses was worn by a very beautiful English woman, very tall and well-formed. She called herself Roma; her dress was of black velvet; upon the train was embroidered the wolf with Romulus and Remus; her hair fell in waves to her waist, and upon her head she wore a turret-like diadem of gold. A belt was embroidered—in gold—with the name she had chosen. Another extremely pretty costume was that worn by Madame de Girardin as Snow. The dress was formed of tulle covered with swan's down in flakes; a mantle, close round her throat, trimmed in the same way, fell to her feet.

ROUGE ET NOIR—ROUGE GAGNE.—At what period in the world's history did a lady, whose hair was naturally brown or black, deliberately go to the hair artiste and request that coiffeur to turn it into a light red? That is what some ladies of Paris are now doing. It is the fashion. Yet more wonderful things still are done to make the ladies more beautiful. Masses of hair, ever augmenting in size, are stuck on where nature's handiwork ends. These bosses commenced with us modestly enough; they are now about the circumference of a soup plate. As much as one hundred francs is paid for one of these hairy deceptions, which are generally imprisoned in network, occasionally studded with diamonds, and often half-circled with a broad golden comb. Do you think invention ends here? Not a bit of it.

The front hair is a curious nest of floral and other conceits, reminding us of an old poet's lines:

Her hair was rolled in many a curious fret,
Much like a rich and curious coronet,
Upon whose arches twenty cupids lay.

And then the little bats with more curious feathery conceits. As a Frenchman said the other day; Trop de cheveux et pas assez de chapeau. What an elaborate get-up appears to be now necessary to invite the more delicate affections of the heart! And how odd this coiffure will look when a quarter of a century has passed away! Do we not now wonder how our fathers fell desperately in love with ladies who dressed in the fashion of the first empire, with waists under their arms, and such a comic head-dress? We almost marvel they married such queer figures, and that we were consequently brought into this wicked world. Go and see the pale ginger-bread wig with long plaits descending to the feet of Madame Carvalho, as "Marguerite" in Faust (when playing at the Lyrique.) Go and see how the doctor passionately runs about the garden after that romantic coiffure. Let us humbly treat all fashions with sublime respect. Not one is superior to their influence. There will always be at least one tyrant in the world so long as fashion exists. All youthful male Paris now falls down and worships red hair.—Paris Letter.

RE-ENACTING OF THE OLD DRAMA—POETRY, POVERTY AND DEATH.—The Paris correspondent of the Publisher's Journal tells the following sad story. It does not detract from its interest that similar ones have so often been told before: We have lost a young poet, under sad circumstances. He was just five-and-twenty. He was the author of a life of Mme. de Lamartine, and a life of Hégésippe Moreau (whose fate was so like his own); he wrote some novels and a volume of poems which sold. But being without any capital (that fulcrum without which the best lever is worthless), he was obliged to transmute ink and paper into gold before he could obtain his daily bread. The consequence was, he fasted more than his constitution could bear. Privations of all sorts superinduced consumption, and for some years past he dragged himself from one hospital to another, and was often refused even this poor shelter. He would have died at home in a quiet little Norman village, had not M. Legouvé (the author of Medea, etc.) who knew his poverty and his desperate health, wrote him that the French Academy had granted a prize to his volume of poetry, Les Chants du Capitole, and he (M. Legouvé) begged him to accept the value of the prize in advance. It was a delicate way of relieving distress. The poor fellow was faltering forth his soul when the letter reached him. Dying as he was, he rose, quitted his family, and came to Paris to hear his name and work applauded. When he discovered the truth he sank lower than ever. One evening, after he had spent all day trying to get admission to a hospital, he sank exhausted at the door of his publisher, M. Bachelin Defforenne, who at once obtained a bed for him at Necker Hospital, where he died. Six men and one woman accompanied his remains from the hospital to the graveyard, where they were placed in the Potter's Field. I never hear of one of these premature deaths, brought on by want, without thinking of poor Rachel, who, when panting for breath, and without appetite, at a table laden with every delicacy which could challenge sickness's whims, said, with a melancholy smile: "Had some good soul advanced me a few hundred chickens and a few hundred loaves of bread, I should not be the invalid I am."

An extraordinary affair lately occurred in the town of Orel, in Russia. A great local landowner had a large sum (43,000 silver rubles) to receive through the police office of that town. On applying for the amount he was told that the money could not be handed over to him unless he presented the office with 5,000 silver rubles. He refused, and immediately reported the case to St. Petersburg, and the money was paid over to him. But on the evening of the same day, as he was quietly smoking in his study, a loud ring was heard at the bell. The servant on opening the door was instantly pinioned, and four men, their faces covered with black crape, rushed into the room. The landowner asked them what they wanted; they plainly told him he must hand over his 43,000 rubles. With the greatest coolness he went over to his strong box, opened it, seized a revolver, which was laid on the top shelf, and shot two of the robbers dead, the other two immediately taking to their heels. He sent for assistance, the police, etc., and on the crape being removed from the faces of the dead men they were recognized as the head of the police and his secretary.

A NEW DODGE OF EATING-HOUSES.—The restaurants in Paris, particularly those which the working classes frequent, are making a great stir. Lately, one just opened in the Faubourg Montmartre, promised a dinner of two courses and a dessert to whoever wrote, in a legible hand, the answer to a rebus offered every morning for solution by the dame de comptoir. Another, in the Faubourg Saint Antoine, hit on a still more strange expedient: he chose for his ensign a gigantic golden sausage, which he swung enticingly over the door of his restaurant, the words "A la saucisse d'or," in huge gold letters, blazing beneath. His salon was large, its white walls decorated by festoons of the tempting edible so highly appreciated on the other side of the Rhine, and in every 50th sausage was a five franc piece in gold. His principle was that, as his customers called for sausages, they should be cut off in regular rotation from the string so artistically arranged round the dining-hall. The result may be better imagined than described. The eager anxiety depicted on the countenance of every ouvrier, as he nervously examined and finally ate his sausage, would have supplied a phrenologist with many good subjects for study. The expedient proved most remunerative to the proprietor, but the quarrels that ensued were of so serious a nature that the police have interfered, and the master has received orders either to shut up his shop or to proceed on a less exciting system.

NAPOLEON III. AS AUTHOR.—The long expected Life of Cesar, by Napoleon III., will in part appear between the 1st and 15th of December, maybe on the anniversary of the Dix-Unit Brumaire and coup d'état—the second day of this month. If M. Guizot or M. Thiers has any share of Job's feeling when he cried, "Oh, that mine enemy would write a book!" they may whet Jeffrey's or Voltaire's scalpel, for I believe all commentators are agreed that all Job wanted was a chance to "cut up" his enemy in the buff-and-blue published in the land of Uz. Napoleon III. was anxious to postpone the publication until both volumes were ready. But M. Plon, the printer and publisher, suggested that it would be best to issue each volume separately, and convinced the author. It has not yet been decided whether the price shall be six or eight francs.—Paris Letter.

At the Petersburg Fair, England, was offered for public exhibition a being in human shape, of stature tall and stont, wearing only the semi-savage garb around his middle, and encircled by a leather belt, styled an American Indian and "vermin killer." A sort of box was then brought forward (loket) containing live rats, upon which the cannibal-like countenance of the "vermin-killer" brightened up with excited delight, and upon the lid being raised, he seized the rat in his hand, and placing its head between his teeth, with a sickening crash of the skull, instantly killed it, and devoured the whole in little over a minute. The same scene was repeated throughout till the whole dozen was stowed away in the capacious stomach of the brute, leaving only three or four tails from the lot, thereby putting into the shade the exploits of the dog Billy, and eclipsing the wide-spread fame of the Kilkenny cats.

AND STILL ANOTHER VERSION OF "THE TICKET-OF-LEAVE MAN."—We recently published a story wherein a ticket-of-leave man figured after a fashion not calculated to excite the popular sympathy in behalf of that style of martyrs. But the story of "Bob Briery" in the play of The Ticket-of-Leave man finds a curious illustration and supporter from real life in the following police report which appeared in a late English paper:

"At the Warwickshire sessions, on the 19th of October, George Haynes, twenty-five, was charged with having, at Stratford-on-Avon, on the 12th of August last, stolen two pounds weight of beef. The prisoner pleaded guilty, and asked to make a statement. The chairman having remarked that he had been previously sentenced to penal servitude at Gloucester assizes for housebreaking, the prisoner said that was really true. He committed the offence when he was only thirteen years of age, and was sent to Gibraltar, to the penal settlement there. After having been imprisoned for three years and a half, his conduct had been so satisfactory that he had been released upon a ticket-of-leave. He forthwith returned to England, and did all he could to obtain an honest livelihood. After working for four years in Warwick, during a part of that time he had attended regularly at All Saints Church, Emscote, and assisted in the choir, he went to reside at Stratford, got work, and attended the parish church at Charlcote, singing in the choir. All things went on well with him and with his family for a long time. One day, one of the Stratford police, named Weston, called upon him, and asked if he had ever been transported. He declined at first to answer the question; but ultimately admitted that such was the case. From that time his prospects were blighted. He was dismissed from the choir at Charlcote Church, and lost his place. In every way he was being hunted down and oppressed. At the time he took the meat, his wife and children were in a starving condition, and he took the meat for them.

"Rev. T. B. Dickens, of Emscote, sent a letter, testifying to the prisoner's character as being honest, sober, and in every way respectable. Mr. Kynnersley expressed his deep regret at the statement which the prisoner had made. If it was true, and upon the face of the facts it seemed probable, the policeman had exceeded his duty, for he ought not to have interfered with him at all. The prisoner seemed to have conducted himself creditably, and the former offence might have been considered buried in oblivion. Both he and his brother magistrates considered that the prisoner had been hardly dealt with, and, under the circumstances, he would only be sentenced to fourteen days' hard labor."

ABSINTHE IN FRANCE.—There is a crusade going on in France against the use of absinthe, not unlike to that which has so long been carried on in America against the use of all kinds of ardent spirits. "The pale green demon," as absinthe is called, is charged with being as destructive an agent as ever was old King Alcohol. It is said to act with much more rapidity than brandy. Then it is terribly adulterated, in order that it may be sold cheap, and placed within the reach of the lowest purse; and so the demon calls to his aid a host of spirits who are even worse than himself. The use of this tippie—which is a very pleasant and seductive tippie—is so common, that it may almost be pronounced universal. About eleven o'clock (the old "bitters" hour of our anti-temperance times) almost every Frenchman who can afford the sin, proceed, faire son absinthe—which done, he feels better for the times preparatory to feeling much worse for a longer time. The reformers are calling for what would here be called Maine-law legislation. They would have government prohibit its use altogether, which would be to substitute one kind of worm-wood for another. But Napoleon will be slow to listen to this demand, as absinthe is very popular in the army, the men stationed in Algeria being in an especial sense partial to it, and consuming an immense quantity. The army is the Emperor's chief support, and the African army is the most trustworthy of all the military. He'll hardly listen to a request to comply with which would cause his very throne to reel. The soldiers must be permitted to drink, in order that their master may be able to sleep in peace; and it would not answer to have one law for the military and another for the pékings, as the soldiers call civilians. There is not much liberty in France, but equality is there dominant.

The rope-trick of the Davenport Brothers is an old thing, according to the King of Oude, who says that in India it used to be performed in this fashion: The performer was tied neck and feet and put into a sack, the mouth of which was carefully secured; he was then thrown into deep water, from which he emerged swimming, free from both ropes and sack. A London paper urges subjecting the Davenport Brothers to this test.

A LONDON paper, facetiously announcing certain forthcoming books, which exist only in fancy, mentions, among others, "A highly interesting collection of letters by the Foreign Secretary, entitled Letters I had Better Not have Written. It is supposed," adds the journalist, "that the collection will contain most of the official despatches sent off by Earl Russell since the commencement of his holding office, and, of course, all his epistles bearing on the Danish question."

BURDELL'S
Oriental Tooth Wash.*SOUND AND WHITE TEETH

Are Indispensable to Personal Attraction, and to Health and Longevity, by proper mastication of the food.

THIS UNIQUE PREPARATION IS OF INESTIMABLE value in preserving and beautifying the Teeth, strengthening the Gums and in imparting a delicate fragrance to the breath. It eradicates tartar from the Teeth, removes spots of incipient decay, and polishes and preserves the enamel, to which it imparts a PEARL-LIKE WHITENESS. Its anti-septic and anti-scorbutic properties exercises a highly beneficial and salutary influence; they arrest the further progress of the decay of Teeth, induce a healthy action of the Gums, and cause them to assume the brightness and color indicative of perfect soundness; while, by confirming their adhesion to the Teeth, they give unlimited enjoyment and fresh zest to appetite, by perpetuating effective and complete mastication. It speedily removes those ravages which children sustain in the teeth, owing to the improper use of sweet and acid substances.

THE BACHELOR'S DREAM EXPLAINED.

I think you remember that some months ago, I was courting a handsome young girl; Since then I went traveling up country, you know, And I've now lost the run of my Belle.

I loved her so dearly—I do love her yet, Of course she must know very well; Indeed, I am ready to go in a fit Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

I've made an inquiry of all the young chaps— Been searching at every hotel; I've now and then called on old Schiedam Schnapps Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

Kept running all day like a fool in the street, To search for another young girl; And every fine lady I chance for to meet, I've inquired for my old lover, Belle.

I start for a Photographic Gallery, To look for my sweet little Belle; And who in the name you think I should see? A face of that very same girl!

I then said, "Dear Belle, I've caught you at last; Are you lying, or here in disguise?" And what do you think, my friends, it was? A picture of her in life size.

Now to be seen at H. BUSH'S Gallery, corner of Post, Market and Montgomery streets, entrance opposite the Masonic Hall. oc29 3m

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS.

STORMS over the mountains have prevented the electric current from performing its allotted duty, and we have been without despatches for the greater part of the week. What we receive is mainly delayed material which accumulated on the operator's file while the wires were not working. Sherman's march through Georgia still seems to be problematical, and will probably remain so until communication is opened to the coast, that being the only possible way of getting correct information. A Richmond despatch, dated the 12th, says that "Sherman is near Savannah, probably not 5 miles distant." Skirmishing seems to have been kept up along his line of march from Millen, with but little benefit to the opposing forces. While writing there is news via Richmond to the effect that Sherman met the rebels under Smith, Hardee and Cobb some 12 miles from Savannah and defeated them. Foster is in communication with Sherman! With our readers we are hopeful of what another week may bring forth. Grant is on the move. The Richmond oracles are again proclaiming; this time they utter an alarm. As most all news from Grant's front must now be contraband we hear little from that quarter; but we glean from the papers of the Confederacy sufficient to convince us that "Grant is moving," and they are afraid of him. There is nothing from Nashville of much moment. Matters, up to the latest dates, are about as our last "record" left them:

December 6.—There is nothing definite from Nashville further than in the report at last dates of less cannonading than usual. Rebel batteries are established on the bluff, fourteen miles down the river. Several gunboats went down and engaged the batteries without dislodging them from their position. A reconnaissance was made by the Union forces, between Lebanon and the Nashville turnpike. After proceeding a short distance the enemy were discovered in considerable force. Our troops charged upon them and drove them off. Two or three men were killed and a number wounded.

December 7.—Richmond papers of the 7th state that, "Sherman's campaign is drawing to a close. He is approaching the coast, by way of Darien and Savannah, but we have a formidable force between him and that point, which he will have to meet. He will have to concentrate his forces before he reaches either point."

Three deserters from Savannah arrived at Fort Pulaski on the 30th. They report that Sherman is advancing on Savannah in three columns—one by the way of Millen, one by the way of the Oconee and Ocmulgee rivers, and the other across the Savannah river, at Sisters' Ferry, seventy miles above. He flanked Macon, but did not stop to occupy it; he had whipped Wayne's and Cobb's militia at Oconee Bridge, driving them in every direction.

The Augusta Chronicle says that Wheeler was fighting the Federals on Wednesday. It states that Wheeler captured 2,000 prisoners. The Constitutionalist, however, says that the "Yankee cavalry" with whom Wheeler fought numbered only 150! But later particulars from the Richmond papers make it appear that Wheeler had to fall back, owing to Kilpatrick's superior numbers! When the history of this war is written, there will be some curious balancing of accounts.

The Richmond Whig says that the rebels at Griswoldville captured the breastworks from the Yankees. The Macon Telegraph says that they charged through an open field within fifty yards of the works, and then withdrew. Another account says that the rebel General Anderson was wounded, and is censured for rashly urging his men against the breastworks.

Hardee, under date of Grahamsville, the 2d, claims that he has repulsed Foster on the railroad at that point, as also a force of marines, under Admiral Dahlgren, at Cooswatchie.

The Richmond Whig says the Yankees appropriated over 2,000 horses and mules in Glascock and Warren counties.

The Charleston Mercury learns that Foster has fortified the position which he took up after the battle on Honey Hill, where, it is supposed, he will remain until Sherman reaches within striking distance of the coast. It states that Foster has been for some days and nights sending up balloons and sky rockets, supposed to be signals to Sherman's approaching hosts.

The Richmond papers say that Gen. Grant is pressing on the right of the Army of the James, and an attack by him there and by the left of the Army of the Potomac is expected.

The Richmond papers print a Fredericksburg letter of the 5th, which says it is reported that six thousand troops had just passed down the Potomac to reinforce Grant; 4,000 of these from Sheridan, and 2,000 new recruits.

A despatch from headquarters of the Army of the Potomac of the 7th reports rather a calm day along the lines at Petersburg. A little picket firing had been indulged in on our right line. The artillery on both sides was very quiet. Considerable activity prevailed along the lines north of the James river. Firing had been kept up on the Dutch Gap Canal all along as usual, but not with such persistency as on the previous day.

A reconnoitering party from the left to-day struck the rebel pickets on the Vaughn road, driving them to Hatcher's Run, (over two miles,) where they had breastworks erected.

Gen. Stevens, cannonading Harper's Ferry, sent out a scouting party in the direction of Waterford to watch Mosby, when they encountered the head of Mosby's force. A skirmish ensued which is reported to be against the Union forces, the rebels outnumbering them three to one. Mountjoy, one Mosby's ablest officers, is reported killed.

When Gov. Brown left Milledgeville, he carried away all his private property, but forgot that belonging to the State. A quantity of powder, and 3,000 stand of arms, according to the Savannah Republican, fell into the hands of "the enemy."

December 9.—The Press has a special despatch from City Point, stating that the Second and Fifth Corps recrossed the James river on the afternoon and night of the 7th, near the Jerusalem plank road, and on the morning of the 8th they marched towards the Stony Creek station.

December 10.—Three regiments of colored infantry, a section of Morton's, with the Fifth Regular Artillery, under Gen. Ludlow, cross to the north side of the James, drive back the rebels, and effecting a lodgment at the upper terminus of the canal, they are enabled to protect the laborers at Dutch Gap.

At daylight the Fifth Corps and the Third Division of the Second Corps, with two brigades of Gregg's cavalry, started south, crossing the Nottaway river without much opposition.

A special despatch to the Louisville Journal of the 9th says that skirmishing is going on near Nashville. The enemy has been driven back to his old line, and but few casualties have resulted. Prisoners report that Cheatham's cavalry holds the rebel right, Lee the centre and Stewart the left. They say that Lee has four batteries of four guns each in position. A rebel brigade has gone in the direction of Murfreesboro.

Burbridge's command was at Bean's Station on the 6th. His forces were well organized and supplied. The movement of Burbridge on Breckinridge's flank compelled the latter to withdraw his entire forces beyond Bull's Gap, excepting a small cavalry detachment. The excitement in town had nearly subsided, and no apprehensions for the safety of the city were felt. The gunboats went down the river to a point where the rebel batteries were located, and engaged them. They drove the rebels back from the river, silenced their guns, and returned to the city.

From Vicksburg, dates to the 4th give Gen. Dana a victory. He destroyed thirty miles of the Mississippi Central Railroad above the Big Black Crossing, including the long bridge at that place; 2,500 bales of cotton, valued at $300,000, and other public property, were destroyed.

The Richmond Despatch of the 10th says the news from Georgia was exciting. "The enemy who had been marching down Ogeechee river with three corps, one on the north and two on the south side, were endeavoring to unite their forces, and met with considerable resistance from the Confederates. At last accounts they had not effected their object, which was also prevented in part by the unfavorableness of the river approaches. On the 7th, a demonstration of the Federals on the ferries on the Savannah river became more determined; they managed to get some of their infantry across the flats in sight of the river. It was reported that the enemy had effected a landing on Cooswatchie river, below Pocotaligo, but had not been able to reach the railroad."

The Augusta Constitutionalist of the 6th says: "On Monday last a fight took place at Walker's Bridge, on Brier Creek, twenty-two miles from Augusta, in which the Federals were worsted. One hundred and twenty-two Yankee prisoners had arrived at Augusta."

December 12.—A Richmond despatch says that Sherman is near Savannah, probably 5 miles distant. Gen. Grant states that a telegram from below Charleston intimates that Sherman was in line of battle, but doesn't say where, confronted by a strong Confederate force.

The following items are furnished by the Richmond Enquirer:

Dutch Gap Canal, they say, can be made ready for use in a few hours. They have a report that a force of our troops effected a lodgment between the two important points, Fort Darling and Howlett's House. It is claimed that one of our gunboats was sunk on Monday by an iron bolt from one of Howlett's House guns.

Resolutions had been introduced in the North Carolina Legislature in favor of sending commissioners to Washington to negotiate peace.

In the rebel Senate on the 3d, Orr introduced a resolution denouncing the capture of the Florida in Bahia Bay.

December 14.—The N. Y. World publishes an account of a battle in front of Savannah, on the 10th purporting to come direct from a loyal resident of Richmond. The rebels under Hardee, Smith and Cobb, are reported to have met Sherman 12 miles from Savannah, on the Ogeechee River, and in an engagement were defeated. Communication had been effected with Foster. The loss on both sides was very severe—2,500 Union, and between 3,000 and 4,000 rebels. Amongst the latter were 1,200 prisoners, including many officers of rank. Several colors, cannons, small arms, wagons and caissons were captured from the rebels. When the last word left, Sherman was close to the coast, and either able to form a junction with Foster and the fleet, or to attack Savannah, with prospects of success.

Official reports from Gen. Rousseau, at Murfreesboro, give a victory to the Union forces under his command. Forrest's demonstrations were all successfully repulsed.

From Grant, the various reconnoissances have been successful. Skirmishing was continued along their route, and the enemy was repulsed in every attack. The corps that crossed the Nottaway reached the Meheria river and destroyed the rebel railroad communication with Weldon, burning the bridges across the Nottaway, and destroying everything. After accomplishing this, the troops returned safely to the lines before Petersburg.

INTERIOR ITEMS.

The Sacramento Union is indebted to Dr. Logan for the information that "the amount of rain which fell on the 11th was 0.276 of an inch; on the 12th, 1.700 inches; on the 13th, 3.240 inches. Total for three days, 5.216 inches. Total, present season, 12.839 inches, or about one-third the amount which fell during 1861-'62." The Union of the 14th, (with a levee-ty of expression quite pardonable,) says: "If the rivers rise five or six feet higher than they have been the present season, we can then, by watching the levees and currents, form an intelligent opinion as to whether there is or not danger to be apprehended."

The Butte Record says: The bridge across Rock creek was swept away. Many of the miners, at the commencement of the rain, rigged up their hydraulic hose and commenced piping. Soon they were compelled to seek shelter, when the reservoir filled and broke, banks caved in, and sluice boxes were washed off and destroyed. Our miner friends say that though a rough winter is visiting them, they don't ask for an "armistice."

From Oroville we learn that the creeks and sloughs in that vicinity were overflowed. The bridge over Dry creek was carried away. About fifty feet of embankment of the California Northern Railroad was washed out.

The Solano Herald says: From all quarters we hear of a great loss of stock occasioned by heavy rains. Seven hundred sheep belonging to W. S. Wells have been drowned in the tule land between Cache creek and Steamboat slough.

James Myers, a Prussian, aged thirty-four years, was drowned, recently, in a slough at Charley's ranch, Butte county. His body was recovered.

A man named Edward Woodington was drowned in Dry creek, while attempting to ford it near the Cottage Hill House.

An old gentleman named Matthews was recently seized by two highwaymen, near Virginia, Nevada, and robbed of a valuable watch.

The Supreme Court of California adjourned, Dec. 8th, to meet on the first Monday in January.

F. W. Fairbanks claims to have discovered a process by which the gum extracted from a species of fir tree which abounds in Butte county, Cal., can be made to furnish an excellent quality of resin—a discovery which promises immense benefits to the State.

The indebtedness of Nevada is $358,000. The Enterprise estimates the taxable property at $80,000,000, which will yield a revenue of $240,000.

Fair by stage from Virginia to Sacramento has been raised to $28 from $15.

On the 11th inst., Bill Carder was shot dead by Moses Brockman, in Aurora, as a sequel to a previous difficulty. Brockman is in custody.

The Blue Ledge Mining Company, near Smartsville, Yuba county, has cleaned up $72,660, being the fifth exhibit of their flumes since March last.

Morg. Miller, formerly of Sacramento, has been appointed Deputy State Controller of Nevada.

An express has been established, connecting Prescott, the Capital of Arizona, with the post and express lines of California. Mining on the Colorado is in a highly prosperous condition.

It is estimated that one hundred miles of the Pacific Railroad west from Omaha, Nebraska, will be completed and in running order one year hence.

The flags of the several engine houses in Virginia, Nevada, were displayed at half-mast on the 10th inst., in honor of the memory of F. W. Kohler, of the San Francisco Fire Department.

All the outstanding warrants on the General Fund can be paid on presentation, and leave a balance on hand of $60,000. Quite an improvement in the financial condition of California.

Henry Bart and an old man named Morris were severely injured by the premature explosion of a blast in the Knickerbocker mining claim at San Juan, recently.

A young man by the name of B. F. Johnson was killed near Michigan Bar, California, lately, while cleaning up his sluices, by the caving of an adjoining bank.

Alex. Gillus encountered a robber near Austin, Nevada, both being mounted. The robber politely offered Gillus a drink from a bottle, and when the latter was drinking he found himself covered by a revolver. Gillus put spurs to his horse, and is still one drink ahead of the highwayman.

The Sacramento Bee, of the 14th, says: "Thus far, to-day, the Sacramento river has fallen over six inches; the American river is also giving up the contest with the levees, for at Rabel's Tannery the water has fallen, since yesterday, over three feet, and the City of the Plains reposes in calm and dignified security within her intrenchments, which are calculated for the exigency of at least any ordinary flood."

Judge North, of Nevada, has commenced suit against W. M. Stewart and the proprietors of the Territorial Enterprise, claiming $100,000 damages in each suit, for libel or slander against him in his official capacity as Judge of the late Territorial District Court.

The citizens of Los Angeles are moving to construct a railroad to connect their town with Wilmington, (about twenty miles distant,) the principal seaport of the lower country.

Jeremiah O'Brien, aged about fifty years, while working his claim near Horsetown, Shasta county, received such injuries by the caving of a bank, recently, that he died in a few hours.

IMPORTANT DECISION.—Everybody is going to buy HOLIDAY PRESENTS, at extremely low prices, at FELD BUSH & CO.'s, because they have the largest assortment and most magnificent display of FANCY GOODS AND TOYS ever seen in any part of the world, which are now being unpacked and offered for sale at wholesale, at No. 531 Washington street, and retail at No. 207 Montgomery street, in Russ House Block, San Francisco.

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electro-pathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathize with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required! All letters answered with promptness and with pleasure, if directed to RICHES HAVE WINGS.—Nothing illustrates this more forcibly than the recent fall in mining stocks. Therefore, provide a certainty for your family in the future by insuring your life in the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company—cash assets, $6,500,000.

BIGELOW & BRO., Agents,
Over Parrott's Bank.

WET AND DRY.—What a great propensity people have for imbibing "something" in rainy weather! How can one account for the paradoxical fact that the wetter they get the drier they are? We dropped into Squarza's yesterday afternoon, and from the discourse we found practicing at his bar, concluded that Signor Squarza was a great benefactor in these wet times, and that the compounds of his laboratory were more sought after than India-rubber overcoats and umbrellas.

MR. CHRETIEN PFISTER, No. 221 Montgomery street, under the Russ House, respectfully calls the attention of the public to his extensive assortment of Perfumery, Brushes, Hair-pins, Hair of all lengths and colors, Wigs, Toupees, Combs of every style; Cravats of all kinds; Jouvin's Gloves for ladies and gentlemen; Suspenders, Shirts and Collars; new styles of Head Dresses, and all the latest Parisian accessories of the Lady's and Gentleman's toilet table. LEAVES FROM "PODGERS" JOURNAL.

THE climate of Texas, though mild and salubrious, is at times, during the prevalence of a "Norther," especially, such as to cause a gentleman in scanty wardrobe, and a very moist one at that, to feel very uncomfortable. My shirt was minus sleeves, and hung about me in ribbons; the pants were decidedly unrepresentable—at least I was, until I could get into a better pair; and unfortunately there was no chance of replenishing my wardrobe, except by getting inside a full suit of "soger clothes," which I was very glad to do, and for once to wear Uncle Sam's livery, which, however unbecoming and badly fitting, was far superior to the fractional suit I had landed in. The pants were a world too wide and a "feet" too long; the overcoat covered me all up; the collar reposed on the back of my head, and the tail dragged on the ground, à la Shanghai—and my general appearance was that of the "Artful Dodger;" but my greatest misery was that dreadful invention known as a "military stock"—it is made of leather about a quarter of an inch in thickness, and as unyielding and uncompromising as a Democratic candidate for a place in the Custom House. Its object and intention is to compel the soldier to hold his head up; and, faith! perfect success has crowned the invention, for no man with one around his neck could make an attempt to view his own toes without cutting his own throat or throttling himself. Now, the good Samaritan, who had loaned me the clothes, was a good natured old Sergeant that I had loaned many a "quarter" to, in times past; but old Mac was a thorough soldier, who went in strong for discipline, and would be horrified at the idea of omitting any article deemed by "Regulations" a part and portion of a soldier's wardrobe; and consequently, when I objected to the stock he stood aghast; all argument was unavailing, and I soon found that if I expected to borrow anything to redeem myself from a near approach to a state of puris naturalibus, I had better submit, and so I soon found myself in profound contemplation of the heavens. Any one, to see me, would presume I was immensely fond of the study of astronomy, for the stock threw my chin so high in the air nothing within the space of a half mile came within range of my vision; I came very near not seeing earth at all, and any pleasure I may have derived from the enchantment distance is supposed to lend, was more than made up for by the series of accidents that constantly befel me. I stumbled over barrels of pork, teat poles and tent cords, and except for the elevation at which I carried it should have broken my nose a dozen times a day. I generally closed the performance by walking into a ditch or bog hole, and doing serious damage to the Sergeant's clothes; but a still greater annoyance was that of being taken for a recruit just joined, and the result was, a constant string of interrogations from some hundred or two soldiers, who always deem a recruit a fair object of ridicule and the butt of the camp. The inquiries as to whether my anxious mamma was aware of my locality, whether I was expecting a letter from the clouds, what my views were on annexation, and whether I had not enlisted for the war of 1812, etc., were numerous; they could not exactly understand, either, why I should be allowed to associate and take my bean soup with the officers.

In consequence of having been thoroughly soaked all night a rain storm that had blown down all the tents, and left us to finish out the night in mud and water just even with our noses as we lay, I concluded to "turn out" a little earlier than usual; in fact, I was generally an early riser, and the arguments that morning in favor of it were very urgent; and as the storm had finished its "blow out," and the morning was fair, I concluded to sally out for a day's shooting, there being any number of deer a mile or two up the island. The first question was, where should I get a suitable gun. I was rather shy of a musket, having had a little experience in that way a day or two before. A flock of ducks a mile in extent had decoyed me into an expedition in a miserable old canoe; I borrowed a soldier's musket, and thinking I would bring down a dozen or two, put in a pretty respectable charge, paddled out within a dozen yards of the ducks, stood up in the boat, took deliberate aim at a bunch of "mallards" and "let drive;" the result was very interesting to science and the lookers-on, for the appearance presented was that of a cylinder loaded in the centre and shooting from both ends, the charge at one end emitted in the form of smoke and a blue cloud of soger clothes at the other. I had not much time to come to any definite idea on the extraordinary effects produced by my shot, before the scene of my operations was changed, and I found myself on the bottom, head downwards and my nose in rather uncomfortable proximity to a bed of oyster shells—I came to the surface, then went down again after the musket, and then I secured my game, eight mallards and a canvas-back, (fact!) and paddled ashore, regretting that I had not reversed the musket and shot the ducks with the other end of it—if I had I should have slaughtered about a cord of them. I mention this little circumstance, en passant, to explain my antipathy to Uncle Sam's old-fashioned flint-lock muskets, which are more dangerous to the shooter than the shoot-ee, and if shot butt-end foremost would knock down a whole regiment at a clip.

The old propeller Augusta, then in Government service, (where she made a mint of money,) was lying at Aransas, and hearing that the Engineer owned a rifle, I went on board and borrowed it, all loaded and primed as it was. It was one of the regular old-fashioned Western weapons, a "rum 'un to look at," but undoubtedly "a good 'un to go." Mounting a horse, I rode up the island a couple of miles, and seeing a drove of deer feeding in the tall grass, I dismounted, picketed my horse and for two hours tried my best to get a shot. I crawled on my hands and knees for half a mile, but just before getting within range they would prick up their ears, and fly away.

I had been told that the only way to hunt deer in open ground was to hide and wait patiently until they fed up to within shot. I was tired of chasing them, and, ascending a mound, dug a hole in the sand, got into, covering myself with the long grass; the deer were a mile off and showed no disposition to come within the range of my old iron tube. Feeling drowsy and fatigued I dropped off into a nap. I must have slept two hours or more, and during that time, had dreamed of shooting more deer than a horse could draw down hill, when I was awakened by the snoring of some animal and footsteps approaching. I lay on my face, and raising my head a few inches, peeped out of the grass, and creation! how I felt when I saw a whole drove of deer within twenty yards of me, apparently unconscious of their proximity to the old rifle. The next thing to do was to bring the old gun to bear upon them; it was lying by my side, and inch by inch I drew it along until I got it where I could handle it; the deer were so close to me that the least sound or motion visible would scatter them out of shot instantaneously. I raised my rifle so gradually that the effort, as I lay, made my arms ache dreadfully. It was infernally heavy; I never knew a gun so heavy. At last, when my arms were just ready to drop off, I got it high enough to bear upon a rousing big buck, who was nearest. He stood facing me, and, I think, saw the muzzle of the gun poking out from the grass, and from the manner in which he was eyeing it I should judge he was trying to look down the barrel; thinks I, old fellow, your curiosity will soon be gratified, for I am going to lodge the contents exactly in your forehead, just between your eyes. I had good aim, and pressed my finger on the trigger, gently at first, but harder and harder. "Click!" went the lock—a flash, a "che-bang!" and—that's about all I remember. I have an indistinct recollection of a vision floating before my eyes, and a conglomeration of objects, the most prominent of which were stars, deer and rifles, in all conceivable and possible positions and shapes. Deer with heads down and tails up, going through the air, together with rifles reversed and revolving on their own axis, all lit up by the most brilliant scintillations, only equalled when in our schoolboy days we came down "ker-whack" on the ice. Anyhow, I saw more stars than Herschell ever dreamed of. I don't know how long I lay in a state of nothingness, but when I collected my scattered senses it was night—the stars were twinkling, (not the ones I saw before,) and the chirruping of the crickets and distant murmurings of the surf on the beach, was all the sound that disturbed the silence around me. I roused myself from my stupor, and for a few moments held an interesting conversation with myself. My inquiries as to who I was, where I was, and what I was doing there, were unsatisfactorily answered; for I didn't know myself from the hole in the ground I had just crept out of. Happening to put my hand to my head, I found it bloody, and further investigation proved that I had been "it on the 'ead by summat," as the Cockney remarked, and finally I remembered I had come out for a day's shooting, which had lasted all night. I scratched around for the old gun; the stock was split, and for a foot it was torn open—the ragged edges of the barrel looking like the teeth of a handsaw. The old thing had "bust." I didn't find any deer lying 'round loose, "nary one." Where that bullet went to I didn't know; I was inclined to think it went towards the end of the barrel, but, finding it such a journey, had concluded to return and take a short cut for it.

I picked up myself and the pieces, and started for the camp, where my horse had long preceded me. I arrived just at daylight, and very quietly crept into my tent and "laid low." On subsequent investigation, I found that a little yellow uiger, belonging to the Engineer, had been amusing himself all the day before in pouring in powder and ramming down bullets into that old rifle, until it must have been very nearly full. No wonder it "bust"—so much to do, on short notice and limited space, couldn't be done in a proper manner; consequently the old thing had to follow the example of the musket, and shoot from both ends.

THE Nain Jaune, says a Paris letter, publishes this evening with the date of to-morrow, (October 22,) a white sheet of paper, which I venture to say will annoy the Government more than anything that it could possibly have written. At the top of the front page there is this heading, Recapitulation Politique—Où allons nous? [Political summary—what next?] And then follows a blank, which is continued overleaf.

THE men whom men respect, the women whom women approve, are the men and women who bless their species.

LADIES IN BARRACKS.—The promising young lady, newly fangled in her matrimonial reign, and by the royal duties thereto appending (the moon being over), is delighted to get into military quarters. I have seen one of these young things almost leaping out of her skin with joy upon her first entrée. This agreeable state of matters was, however, of short duration; she soon regretted her lately forsaken and peaceful haunts; when, instead of either leaping or dancing for joy, she tamed down into a very languishing, slipshod housewife. She was married to a jolly ensign, of whom, poor fellow, it might literally have been said that he was "twice caught." Light marching order was not the order of his day; he travelled with a most respectable train of baggage. A pianoforte was on the list; for which his only room not being sufficiently capacious, the quartermaster's store received it, where the rats and mice played their duets and overtures upon it. Chests and trunks abundantly came in, so that the poor disciple, and the partner of his cares, were stowed away among the lumber, very much after the manner in which the steerage passengers are ensconced on board a packet just ready to sail for Van Diemen's Land. They had some pretty little birds in brass wire cages, and a green parrot to keep them from being alone. By and bye, the scene was changed, and other little birds were heard to sing; the piceannies began to show themselves, and were introduced into this sinful world much more rapidly than the finances of their parents justified; "the love they were so rich in" would by no means "make a fire in their kitchen;" for kitchen they had not, nor would the little god turn their spit. Fertile in expedients, the sex are never at a nonplus; handboxes and parasols made way for canisters and rocking-chairs; bird-cages were dismissed for cradles; the washing-tub took precedence of the guitar; and as for the feathered songsters, they were all consigned to other lodgings; their places in the orchestra being occupied by a band of innocent squalidus. Barrack ladies are, for the most part, very clever, good hands at a dish of scandal now and then, as well as getting up a dish of mutton-chops. They, moreover, cultivate the gossiping propensities, for which there could not be a more eligible nursery. They are for ever sifting and prying into one another's business; and politics run so high at times that the interference of their lords and masters is resorted to in order to check the progress of a civil war. Woe betide the unlucky, though quiet youth, who may chance to be within the range of one of our musical amateurs; who produces a sensation as if she was hammering on his nerves, instead of on the keys of her piano: it is one tormenting strum, strum, strum, at the "Downfall of Paris," and "Fly not yet," when you would fly with eagles' wings to the antipodes. I was at one time vis-à-vis to such another lovely cantatrice, who harped alternately on "Drink to me only with thine eyes," and "From night till morn I take my glass;" her face, meanwhile, resembling the full moon in a gale, and bearing the roseate hue of wine, was a faithful illustration of her song.—Camp and Quarters.

POLYGLOT BORER.—When Lord Ward replied to Prince Schwartzberg's flippant remark on the bad French of English diplomats by the apology, "that we had not enjoyed the advantage of having our capital cities so often occupied by French troops as some of our neighbors," he uttered not merely a smart epigram but a great philosophical truth. It was not alone that we had not possessed the opportunity to pick up an accent, but that we had not subordinated our minds and habits to French modes and ways of thought, and that the tone and temper of the French people had not been beaten into us by the roll of a French drum. One may buy an accomplishment too dearly. It is possible to pay too much even for a Parisian pronunciation! Not only have I never found a linguist a man of eminence, but I have never seen a linguist who talked well. Fluent they are, of course. Like the Steek-nadel gun of the Prussians, they can fire without cessation, but, like the same weapon, they are comparatively aimless. It is a feu roulant, with plenty of noise and some smoke, but very "few casualties" announce the success. The greatest linguist of modern Europe, Mezzofanti, was a most inferior man. Of the countries whose dialect he spoke to perfection he knew nothing. An old dictionary would have been quite as companionable. I find it very hard not to be personal just now, and give a list—it would be a long one—of all the tiresome people I know, who talk four, five, some of them six modern languages perfectly. It is only with an effort I abstain from mentioning the names of some well-known men who are the charming people at Rome and Vienna every winter, and each summer are the delight of Ems, of Berlin, and of Ischl. What tyrants these fellows are, too, over the men who have not got their gift of tongues! how they out-talk them and overbear them! with what an insolent confidence they fall back upon the petty superiority of their fluency, and lord it over those who are immeasurably their masters! Just as Blondin might run along the rigging of a three-decker, and pretend that his agility entitled him to command a squadron!

SINCE the betrothal of the heir to the Russian throne, there are four young kings or heirs to kingdoms unprovided with wives—to wit, the King of Bavaria, the King of Greece, Prince Humbert, and the Prince of Orange.

NELSON'S EXTRACT OF Roses and Rosemary.

THE FOLLOWING IS A BRIEF NOTICE of some of its principal virtues, as a mild stimulative, corrective and preservative agent for the hair:

Infancy.—It insinuates its balsamic properties into the pores of the head, nourishes the hair in its embryonic state, accelerates its growth, sustains it in maturity, and continues the possession of healthy vigor, silky softness, and luxuriant redundancy, to the latest period of human life. Genial and purifying, it dispels all scurf and impurity, and renders the use of the fine comb unnecessary.

The Beard, Whiskers, and Mustachios.—Its extraordinary power in promoting the growth of the hair is singularly displayed in creating these ornaments of manhood.

Curl and Embellishment.—In dressing the hair nothing can equal its effect, rendering the hair so admirably soft that it will lie in any direction, producing beautifully flowing curls, and, by the transcendent lustre it imparts, rendering the coiffure inexpensively attractive.

Grey Hair.—Its nourishing properties are eminently successful in the prevention of Grey Hair, and in numerous instances, in the restoration to its original color.

Baldness.—Its productive powers are constantly and surprisingly shown in cases of Baldness, so that in numerous instances where other specifics have been tried in vain, this celebrated Oil has effected a complete restoration of Beautiful Hair.

Sea-Bathing and Violent Exercise.—After indulging in either of these, so apt to exhaust the nourishing matter secreted at the roots or bulbs of the hair, the Roses and Rosemary will be found most efficacious, both in preserving and in immediately restoring the hair to its usual appearance of health with renovated brightness.

Its invaluable properties have obtained the patronage of every Court of the civilized world; and the high esteem in which it is universally held, together with numerous testimonials constantly received of its efficacy, affords the best and surest proofs of its merits.

PATENT IMPROVED

Flesh Gloves and Straps!

For Producing a Healthy State of the System by Friction, Without the Risk of Tearing the Skin, as all the Ordinary Horse-Hair Gloves are liable to do.

THE GREAT VALUE OF THE HORSE-HAIR

Renovator as a therapeutic agent, when applied to the human body, is now too well known to every one who has paid the least attention to the importance of a healthy action of the Skin, to require further comment.

The superior advantages of the Patent Flesh Gloves and Straps, manufactured under this Patent, are that, by a peculiar process in the machinery employed in their manufacture, the points of the Hair are brought perpendicularly to the surface, thereby removing the liability to tear the Skin (a very general complaint against the ordinary kind,) rendering them more pleasant to use, at the same time enabling the process of friction to be much more effectually performed; they are, indeed, a positive luxury to use, apart from their salutary effects.

The peculiar fabric manufactured expressly for the use of Ladies deserves their special attention; it has been highly recommended by the most eminent of the medical profession, and given universal satisfaction to those who have used it.

Stephen Culverwell and Lyon & Co., Brewers, are now using it, and to them I refer.

ON SAILING VESSELS
It has been used to great advantage, where, on account of battering winds, it is difficult to keep fire in the galley.

FOR SMOKY CHIMNEYS
It is a sure cure, and has been used on the Russ House and other first-class buildings in this city.

FOR VENTILATION,

It is unexcelled, and is recommended to architects and owners of buildings where ventilation is required.

FOR MINING PURPOSES

It is well adapted, thoroughly removing all foul air from shafts and tunnels.

The proprietor also refers to the following gentlemen, who have used it: Capt. Lassen, brig Crimea; Dr. Nuttall,

THINGS.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, December 24, 1864.

CHRISTMAS is coming, and consequently, were there any possibility of the aspiration being realized, I'd put Billy Birch's song in the form of a prayer, and——choose to be a baby.

Of course, I'd select a period subsequent to corals and teeth-cutting, for those are experiences which I never wish to undergo again. I can fairly remember the supreme disgust I felt when fat old women and shrivelled old maids would poke their fingers in my mouth to see what progress I was making in dentition—just as though it was any business of theirs.

"They used to do it then, but they daren't do it now"—if they did, I'd bite them.

One of the chief disadvantages of being a baby, if my memory serves me rightly, is the interest which every one feels bound to take in you and all your affairs. They pinch you to see if your arms are fat, and trot you on their knees until all the mother's milk in your little breast is churned into butter, to put you to sleep, when you are not sleepy. The right of every being—and a baby is a being, in a small way—to "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," is invaded on all occasions. You are awakened at all sorts of hours, seasonable and unseasonable, and made to undergo very much the inspection that might be bestowed on a yearling calf.

The color of your hair and eyes is made the subject of impertinent curiosity, and your resemblance to papa the theme of idle speculation—just as though a baby hadn't a right to look like any one he pleased to.

Your uncle shoulders you in his arms as though you were a sack of corn-meal, and makes the most hideous faces, in an attempt to look pleasant and appear at ease, scaring you into convulsions. You wish the silver mug he gave you at christening was flattened against his ugly mug, and that the money it cost had been expended in learning him to talk English to you instead of bobbing you up and down like a balloon while shouting in your delicate and distracted ears:

"Georgy-porgy, deary-peary, ridy-pidy, coachy-poachy, horsey-dorsey, see the bow-wow."

What wonder that so many children grow up idiots, when their bearded uncles set them an example in imbecility so early in life?

We will pass over the annoyance of having young ladies, big enough to have babies of their own, sending over from across the way to borrow you; and the degradation of being mistaken for a girl when you know that you are a boy, because to be made the sport of young ladies and to be constantly and continually misunderstood are annoyances that will probably follow you through life.

Certain it is that the vexation of having people take an interest in you is one that can never be got rid of—unless by some fortunate accident you become a pauper. You will be beset on all sides by friends who advise you not to do this, and caution you against doing that, until your personal liberty becomes restricted to such narrow bounds that in breathing you feel certain apprehensions as to your right to use your own bellows without asking the permission of some third party. You are not even permitted to choose your own companions—this one has a bad record, and you compromise yourself by associating with another.

Very few are willing to accord you the privilege of taking men and women as you find them and judging them wholly by their demeanor to you—not at all by the estimate which the world at large puts upon them.

I am free to confess that at different periods of my life I have found friends among what Miss Braddon would perhaps call THE OUTCASTS, OR THE BRANDS OF SOCIETY, people whom the world flouted and set down as decidedly out of the pale of recognition; yet to me they were kind and true, and would stand by me to the last gasp—at times when fashionable friends would have scattered like sheep.

I remember in my boyhood to have formed a strange friendship with an old saddler, (Dr. H— will remember him perfectly,) a drunken and disreputable fellow—so far as common report went—but a great friend of mine. In early life he had been a sailor, and had visited China, and hour after hour would I sit on his work-bench while he stitched away on harness and halters, perfectly happy in hearing the marvellous tales he told of his adventures in that then wonderful land. He had the reputation in the neighborhood of being a most unconscionable liar, and probably the better part of his stories were pure invention—but what of that? They amused and delighted me, and to my childish liking he was a hero and a traveller, whose like I doubted if the whole round world contained. I had a fever once, and he came and sat by me long hours through, carrying me during the period of convalescence as tenderly in his arms as though he had been my mother.

Twice he saved my life; once when I had fallen through an air-hole in the ice just back of his shop, and again when an old tottery boat in which I was playing with a young companion, broke from its fastenings and went drifting out into the broad lake before a strong west wind. Jumping into a dilapidated birch-bark canoe which lay on the shore, he launched it, and using his arms for paddles, reached us just as the crazy craft was on the point of sinking.

It will be seen that he rescued me from what a reporter would call "a watery grave." Not being then familiar with a certain proverb which possibly guarantees me against death by drowning, I gave him all my gratitude, and broke open my "savings-box" to empty its store of ten-cent pieces into his leather apron. He refused to accept a penny of my wealth—and of course by this magnanimity bound me to him by stronger ties than ever. Poor old fellow; it is many years since I have seen him! I have since learned that Chinese ladies are not so pretty as he pictured them to me, and that he did not translate the tea-chest inscriptions which I carried over to him, rightly; but I pardon him the deceit, and would travel long, long miles to see him to-day.

Must I confess that I have always liked vagabonds, and that I fear I always shall? Of course it is wrong; they are nuisances and it is the bounden duty of every good citizen to suppress them, but even while acknowledging this fact I feel my sympathies drift out to the poor vagabond, floating in rags and with scarcely a spar to cling to upon the wide waters of the world.

Those of my fellow creatures who square their lives by plummet and rule, somehow interest me very little; they are good people, undoubtedly, but they bore me. Talking with them is very much as though a grown man should sit himself down to read primers. They never reveal to me the mysteries of the human heart, making me familiar with its passions and its wild stormy workings; they only teach me how to be stupid, and that is an art which one acquires intuitively.

But this is a wild digression from the Christmas which we started in with.

I was going to remark that of all created beings at the present time, I'd choose to be a baby, through with the measles, whooping-cough, croup and scarlet fever, and just old enough to toddle about and be petted by everybody. For there is such an abundance of toys in market, and toys have reached such a development since I was a child, that I'd like to have Time turn backward in his flight and make me a child again, not only for to-night, but for every Christmas night of my life.

Any wild confusion of ideas that may occur in the course of this article, and very unorthodox expressions of faith, must be set down directly to the charge of the Fire Department.

I have not been myself since aroused at about 3 o'clock the other morning by the cry of fire directly beneath my window. The rattle of engines, and the hoarse bellow of trumpets.

The fire was in the rear of the Mercantile Library, directly opposite to that Mechanics' Boarding House, popularly known as "The Occidental," where I reside.

There wasn't much of a fire and the Hall bell didn't ring, but such an infernal noise as the gentlemen in red shirts contrived to make never jarred my ears before. Hoarse orders were issued, whether to "man the brakes," or break a man, to "shake her up," or "shake her down," I couldn't tell, and I don't think the man who bellowed them out knew the difference himself.

Not satisfied with the noise that the hand-machines made, an immense steam-squirt had to come along, puffing and blowing like an asthmatic alderman, and threatening to explode with every gasp of its brass-bound lungs.

The fire was put out fast enough and well enough, but it seems to me that an enterprising citizen with a good-sized syringe could have managed the affair with quite as much celerity and with infinitely less noise. Happening to be suffering from a nervous headache that night, and having just fallen into a first sleep, I must be pardoned for making an exception to my general rule of friendship and admiration for vagabonds; and in favor of whom this exception is made my noisy serenaders of the other night must guess.

I must congratulate my sporting friends on the excellent gunning which the small lakes within the city limits afford. It has long been known that any time during the prevalence of a heavy shower one stood an excellent chance for getting a duck in attempting to cross Montgomery street at divers points, but it remained for my friend McCoppin to show the community what could be done by a judicious application of powder and lead.

In a small lake at the Mission, the other day, he contrived to get

Three ducks with but a single shot, and to get arrested as well, for shooting within the city limits.

It is well to learn that the Mission is within the city limits; for the fact was unknown to me before. I always supposed McCoppin owned it, as well as the railroad that runs there, and it is not at all clear to my mind even now that he doesn't; and if a man may not shoot on his own preserves, to say nothing of his own property, what is the personal liberty law good for?

Nor did I know that shooting within the city limits was forbidden, for a deal of shooting is done on Montgomery street and no great punishment seems to follow the violation of the ordinance. I suppose that only serious shooting is allowed; going a-gunning after men, for instance, which is a mild way of making game of one's fellow-creatures.

I had intended to say something about the grand bal cosmé at the Cosmopolitan last evening, but my head is yet too dizzy with the music and lights, and all that, to attempt the descriptive or the graphic with any chance of success. Besides, there is a chance that Bella Donna may take up the subject in full next week, and her pen is decidedly mightier than the sword which I wore last evening as "Don Cesar de Bazan." It was a magnificent affair, and trusting that a full and complete account of it will appear in THE CALIFORNIAN of next week, I remain, happily and virtuously,

INIGO.

NOVEMBER.

Amidst the withered leaves I lie;
I look upon the sober sky;
I am not young; I am not old;
I am not rich; I am not poor;
I cannot fear what may not be,
And of what hath been I am sure.

I muse—I neither laugh nor sigh;
Of all the faded landscape, I
Am part; I am not tired of life;
And yet, I would not live anew,
Though woods and wolds forever green
Should be, and skies forever blue.

GOLDEN PIPPINS.

“NOW, Ray, seriously, you are not vexed with me? You yourself would have been the first to bid me go.”

Far down below the precipitous ledge of the mountain path the valley seemed to swim in mists of gold, while here and there, among the overhanging roses, a deep-dyed sumach tossed its crest of crimson plumes in the spicy air of mid-October, and the coral-red berries of the dogwood glowed like burning coals in the tangled wildernesses of the woods. It was a very pretty background for wood-nymph or hamadryad, and Rachel Martin's attitude was unconsciously artistic as she played with the wild blue asters that covered her little basket of hickory nuts, spoils from the great old tree whose giant branches overtopped the whole forest.

She was plump and pretty, with round, wondering blue eyes and a mouth like a magnified cranberry, while the roses on her cheek seemed to come and go with every breath she drew, and the faint touches of sunshine on her brow gave additional charm to her fresh, rustic beauty. Mark Douglas leaned over the twisted beech-root that separated them, and tried to take the brown hand in his, but it was drawn away with decided quickness.

“Ray, dearest!”

Ah, he did not see the blood mantling to her cheek under the atrocious “Shaker-bonnet”—he did not hear the quick, stormy throbbing of the petulant heart. “Dearest,” indeed! When Kezian Truman's beau never so much as went to Boston without asking her leave, and Charley Jenkins had distinctly intimated that the whole programme of his future existence was to be indicated solely by Miss Martin's wish. Yes, it was all very well for Captain Mark to stay at home, officiating in the Home Guard department; she liked the uniform, and didn't object to the martial éclat. But to go down among the rebels without so much as consulting her inclination, the spoiled beauty thought that was altogether a different thing.

“I see you are in no mood to discuss this matter impartially just now, Rachel,” Captain Mark said, gravely. “I had thought, I had hoped to find you feeling differently.”

“In no mood!” Rachel colored hot scarlet. What right had Mark Douglas to treat her like a naughty child?

“I beg your pardon, Captain Douglas,” she said, petulantly; “it isn't at all necessary to discuss a matter so perfectly indifferent to me.”

Now Douglas was only a man, with all the infirmities incident to mankind. He bit his lip, and his brow grew dark.

“Rachel, you seem to have forgotten the engagement.”

“Engagement!” she repeated, sharply. “I am tired of an engagement that only fetters one party while the other is free as air.”

“Tired!” He hesitated a moment, as if vainly striving to command his voice: “Do you wish to be released, Ray?”

She did not answer—perhaps she was not quite prepared for this phase of affairs.

“Tell me—yes or no!” he demanded, sternly.

“Yes,” she answered, with pettish abruptness.

“Then good-by, Ray.”

Gone? Yes, he was gone. She watched him descending the mountain side with quick, even strides under the scarlet draperies of clinging vines, through patches of deep, still shadow, into belts of golden sunshine, until the overhanging rock hid him from her view; yet it seemed so difficult to believe that he was really gone.

She looked down at the tiny engagement-ring that sparkled on her fore-finger—a simple turquoise, set in virgin gold, whose blue glimmer shone dimly through her tears—and she could not but remember the tender words with which he had placed it on her finger.

“Let it be a token between us, dearest, like the signet rings of old times. Wherever I may be, this ring will always bring my heart back to its queen.”

And now!

“I ought to have returned it,” she pondered, shrinking as if the slender circlet of gold were a ring of fire. “I will—some time!”

So Mark Douglas lost his sweetheart, and marched down to Petersburg a solitary man, marvelling, as many a one has done before him, on the inscrutable mysteries of the female heart.

“Dretful keen wind, ain't it?” said the Widow Taylor, untying the strings of her worsted hood; “powerful sharp frost last night! Deacon Pettibone's dahlias is black as soot, and all Miss Morrisou's mornin'-glories is blasted. Thankee, Miss Martin, my feet is cold; won't you take the rockin'-cheer yourself? Why, Rachel, child, what ails you? all the neighbors are talkin' 'bout how you've changed!”

“Rachel colored, and turned away.

“I am well enough.”

“I tell ye what, Miss Martin,” began Mrs. Taylor, in a mysterious whisper to the elder lady, “you jest take a double handful o' green willer bark, and bile it up well—or snakeroot tea ain't bad—and give her a pint night and mornin'. It's the most strengthenin' thing! But I've come round to tell you what the Women's Committee have decided on.”

“Ah, indeed?” said Mrs. Martin, inquiringly.

“We all feel to be dretful thankful the harvest's been so good, and—and—everything's fetched up jest about right,” intoned the widow; “and so we thought it would be kind 'o squarun' up with a merciful Providence to send a box or tew o' things out to them poor soldiers that's a fightin' like all possessed! It's only accordin' to Scriptor, you know, and it would be a kind o' uice little Thanksgivin' gift, now wouldn't it?”

The widow drooped her eyelids sanctimoniously, and went on:

“Miss Darby's kindly gin us a bushel o' them sweet-potatoes they raised in the south pasture lot. They're a little damaged, not exactly fit for market, but there's no doubt the soldiers 'll be glad to get 'em; and Miss Deacon Pettibone has promised us a lot o' that there fermented peach sass, and Desire Wallace has made up a sight o' book marks, and Widow Smith has cooked a peck o' doughnuts, without no sweetin'. Sugar's so high, and tain't likely the soldiers care for sweet stuff. As for me, I reely don't like to tell about my mite; but I hunted up a few o' poor dear Deacon Taylor's old trowsers and coats in the garret—a little moth-eaten and rather tender, but I hain't no doubt they'll be welcome. Ole Jones has giv' us half a pound o' tea and a pound o' candles, and Mr. Meriam contributes a set of law-books, that they tell me is dretful improvin' readin'. And the Committee calculated you and Rachel would help us.”

“Of course we will,” assented Mrs. Martin, recovering promptly from the momentary bewilderment and amusement caused by the widow Taylor's valuable list of treasures; and—

“Then I may as well be stirrin’,” ejaculated the widow, jumping up; “for I've got to see Miss Dr. Davison and Squire Ladd yet to-night. Good-evenin' t' ye—and don't forget the willer-bark tea!”

Mrs. Martin and Rachel both burst out laughing as the door closed.

“Poor Mrs. Taylor!” said Mrs. Martin.

“Mamma, how cau she?” demanded Rachel, indignantly. “Such a box for the soldiers! Why, it would only be an aggravation.”

“Never mind, Ray, dear,” said her mother, soothingly; “I'll make up a lot of real doughnuts, and pack 'em round the biggest pair of turkeys father cau find, with a box of little pumpkin pies; and you shall send a barrel of those golden pippins from the old tree beyond the brook—the tree Mark Douglas liked so well. They're in the garret, in that old green chest; and be sure and put in plenty o' good clean straw to prevent their mellerin' against each other.”

Rachel obeyed; and Mrs. Martin never had the least idea of the tears she shed, with her trim little figure half into the barrel, as she packed the great fair yellow apples among the yellow straw. If the golden pippins could only have spoken, what a Thanksgiving story they might have told to the Army of the Potomac.

“It's jest like you women-folks to keep thinkin' of such things,” he declared. “Now it never wouldn't ha' come into my great wooden head—and jest to think how much better our Thanksgivin' dinner'll taste, for rememberin' the poor fellows that's fightin' for us! Gee up, Dolly!”

And Mr. Martin winked his misty eyes and cracked his whip simultaneously.

“I—don't—see—where—it—can—be!”

The golden vapors were all faded away from the sweet valley now—the grey November sky stretched its dreary canopy of cloud over the glens and forests, and the yellow leaves were raining sadly down around Ray Martin's feet as he hurriedly traversed the mountain path, pushing aside the red and russet drifts with eager, tremulous fingers, and searching as if for some precious lost talisman.

“Oh, to think that I should have dropped it!” she faltered half aloud. “While I wore it I could still fancy our parting was but a dream. Oh, where could I have lost it!”

And she sat down on the twisted beech-root and cried heartily, while the moaning of the chill wind brought back an echoing cadence to her ears.

“Gone—gone!”

“A barrel of golden pippins! O Mars! isn't it jolly!”

The first lieutenant executed an impromptu hornpipe around the barrel as Captain Douglas prized up the cover with a hammer.

“We're very much obliged to Company A,” said the latter sedately. “I hope you didn't forget that, Jennings?”

“Oh, of course I did the polite. Company A was so obliging as to send us the barrel, and keep the great leviathan of a box for its own delectation. I just wish you could have seen Dodsley's face when he opened it!”

“What do you mean?”

“Such a conglomeration of decaying Caroline potatoes, sour sweetmeats, old rags, and law-books! I didn't stop to investigate very closely, however; it was my interest to roll the barrel down hill as fast as possible, lest Dodsley should repent of his generosity. I confess I was a little nervous while you were opening the barrel, lest it should contain cold victuals and pine kindlings. Hullo! what's this?” he exclaimed, taking a slip of paper that had lain beneath the lid: “‘A Thanksgiving remembrance!’ Much obliged to you, my unknown friend. I'll keep my Thanksgiving now.”

Douglas caught the slip from his friend's hand; a deep flush rose into his cheek as he recognized Ray Martin's delicate and rather peculiar handwriting.

“The same old apples that used to lie in the spheres of gold in the long grass of the river meadow? I thought I knew them!” he pondered. “Jennings—”

But Jennings had dodged out to promulgate the good tidings among his fellow-officers. At the same instant Mark Douglas' eye caught a foreign glitter among the yellow straw.

The turquoise ring!

His heart gave a sudden leap as he remembered the careless, half-romantic words with which he had placed it on her finger. And then came the revulsion of feeling.

“What a fool I am! as if she could have known the destination of this chance gift!”

Yet above the cold and calculating voice of reason, a far more welcome tone kept repeating to the ear of his heart, with perpetual refrain:

“She has called me back to her; she has called me back!”

The twilight of Thanksgiving Eve was brooding darkly over Mr. Martin's great, old-fashioned kitchen, where the glow of pine logs afforded the only illumination, and a shrill-voiced cricket piped behind the chimney bricks. Ray saw the red gleams flickering on the leafless maples across the road, as she walked slowly down the sloping path, with a gray shawl wrapped round her head, and fresh carnations, born of the sharp, keen wind, on her cheeks.

She started in quick affright as a footstep sounded among the rustling leaves at her side, and a gentle touch fell on her arm.

“Ray!”

And then she knew that the troubled dream was over.

The old clock behind the strings of red pepper had chimed nine before Rachel thought of the question that would have been most natural to ask first.

“But how—why—what made you come back?”

“You summoned me, Ray.”

“I? Never, Mark!”

He held up the turquoise ring with an arch look of defiance, and all at once the truth broke upon her.

“Let me put it on your finger once again, Ray, never to be removed except for the wedding-ring of gold!”

She let her head droop an instant upon his shoulder, and then looked up through sparkling tears.

“Oh, Mark, I think this will be the most real Thanksgiving of my life!”

THERE is an allegorical story current that once, immediately after Theodore Parker had parted from Ralph Waldo Emerson on the road to Boston, a crazy Millerite encountered Parker, and cried: “Sir, do you not know that the world is coming to an end?” Upon which Parker replied: “My good man, that doesn't concern me; I live in Boston.” The same fanatic overtaking Emerson, announced in the same terms the approach of the end of the world; upon which Emerson replied: “I am glad of it, sir; man will get along much better without it!”

Hissing to show disapprobation is of great antiquity. Though Shakspeare makes very few allusions to the practice, he speaks very plainly of it in the Merry Wives of Windsor: “If I do not act it, hiss me.” It was used to public speakers some nineteen centuries ago, as appears from the following passage in Cicero's letters. Speaking of the orator Hortensius, Caelius thus describes the success of his eloquence: “It is worthy of observation, that Hortensius reached his old age without once incurring the disgrace of being hissed.”

A LADY, who was in the habit of spending a large portion of her time in the society of her neighbors, happened, one day, to be taken suddenly ill, and sent her husband in great haste for a physician. The husband ran a few rods, but soon returned, exclaiming: “My dear, where shall I find you when I get back?”

How many a son of genius sits down daily to the task of consoling and mending human hearts while his own is breaking.

IMPORTANT DECISION.—Everybody is going to buy HOLIDAY PRESENTS, at extremely low prices, at FELDBUSH & CO.'s, because they have the largest assortment and most magnificent display of FANCY GOODS AND TOYS ever seen in any part of the world, which are now being unpacked and offered for sale at wholesale, at No. 531 Washington street, and retail at No. 207 Montgomery street, in Russ House Block, San Francisco.

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electro-pathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathize with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required! All letters answered with promptness and with pleasure, if directed to

HEARTS ARE TRUMPS.

HEARTS are trumps, and the knave's not out!
Oh, happy player thou,
With never a tear in thy bright young eyes,
Nor frown upon thy brow.

The King of Diamonds hides his face,
For Wealth is not the stake,
And a practiced player, playing here,
Would never a fortune make.

Players ye in the game of LIFE,
Who have no thought of fraud—
Who'll not believe the knave is out
In all the country broad.

The game of life is long and hard,
Ah, few are they that win!
And yet each one must hold his hand,
And each his cards play in.

The right of Clubs, (the right of power,
And power is in the name,)
Nor the right of Spades, though labor's right,
Must never win the game.

Oh, gold is great, and wealth has power!
The world's applauding thump
Is sweet; yet pray, in the game of life,
That HEARTS may turn up trump.

THE LAKE OF THE BROKEN HEART.

A LEGEND.

BY EMILIE LAWSON.

MANY years ago, when what is now the fine city of St. Louis was but a small frontier town, inhabited by a few French settlers, a few enterprising fur traders from the East, and numberless Indians and river boatmen, there flourished, a few miles further west, a small French village.

Here, in a log cottage with a lattice porch in front, dwelt the weaver of the village, with his wife and one child, the gentle Leonie.

Here, day after day, did this good man weave linsey cloth and linen, and the fair hands of his daughter gathered the bark of the butternut to dye the one, and spread the other on the beautiful green plat of grass before the cot to bleach, ever humming some little snatch of a song, some rippling melody, flowing from her lovely mouth like the mountain brook wimping on its pebbly way.

It was her hands that gave an air of enchantment to this little cot. The walls displayed a few pictures copied from the old masters, each picture hung with brilliant wreaths of the leaves of Autumn; on the shelf, above the open fire-place, clustered all the wealth of flowers the great forest could show.

Her only companion was Louis Dorée who lived with a bachelor uncle, on a little farm near a beautiful lake called, by a tribe of Indians long since extinct, "Odamin"—or the Lake of Strawberries—perhaps from the quantities of vines that in early Spring made the banks scarlet with this rich, odorous fruit.

These children were inseparable, now wandering over the farm, gathering buttercups—those sunny faced babies of the soil that laugh from every corner of God's tillable ground,—or watching the patient oxen as they slowly furrowed the little patches of fields, or listening to the chattering crows on the surrounding trees—a great sable flock that seemed discussing the belligerent powers of that swaggering and apparently drunken lord of the cornfield, the scarecrow.

And for days together they would fish or hunt on the banks of the crystal lake, and, when weary of this sport, would build a fire of brush and moss and cook their dinner in true Indian fashion; not unfrequently did they have a real Indian at their banquet. Here, on a great flat sandstone, the top of a cliff overlooking the water, they would serve their broiled birds on birch-bark platters, garnished with wild berries and trimmed with flowers of every hue and odor imaginable; for around these slopes grew that bright green tuft, tipped with scarlet, called the "Indian Paint Brush." In the shallow parts of the lake bloomed the pure white lily, filling the air with sweetest fragrance; over the rocks climbed the columbine, with its honey-horns and its gorgeous coloring; and here and there over the tanglement of vine and flower stood dead trees covered with trailing moss, like skeletons of the past garlanded with faded finery.

Here, in the Autumn, they would watch the great migratory flocks sailing like clouds, southward, and see their curious and wise habits on the land, when their great thundering division would descend from their lofty heights to the thickets and groves to regale themselves on the sassafras and poke berries, much as an idealist might be drawn from his etherial realms of fancy by the odor of a beefsteak. Then after robbing the trees of all the ripe fruitage, they would fly to the lake to drink, first stationing a sentinel on the topmost bough of a tree to give warning, if any foe, either man or beast, should approach. In the woods that hemmed this lake, they learned the haunts of rabbit and squirrel, and the tracks of the sly fox and the fleet antelope. And sometimes, in a bark canoe, they would idle the hazy hours, gathering lilies and telling stories of their own imagining; but wherever their castles were builded, the same dark boy was king, the same soft-eyed girl the queen.

And now the only surviving relative of Louis was dead.

The gentle-hearted farmer, so humbly and faithfully true to his unambitious calling, had gone, leaving his grain ungathered and his fruits unplucked. Death ploughed a furrow in the little Norman churchyard, and kindly hands slanted the simple mound and raised a white wooden cross over the remains of Victor Dorée.

And then the weaver kindly took the lonely boy to his quiet home, and soon Louis forgot his bereavement, and the two children were better friends than ever. Their greatest happiness was now to sit by the crackling log fire (for it was Winter) and crack the hazel or hickory nuts from the great stores they had garnered in the Fall, and eat the luscious persimmons purpled by the snow and frost, and weave wreaths of laurel and pine for their log walls.

Here too, they learned somewhat of the literature of an earlier age; for Leonie's mother was a woman of taste and learning, far above the simple villagers. One book especially delighted the children: it was an old, old book written by a French author a short time after the re-discovery of America by Columbus—a purely speculative work on the desolateness and the savagery of the supposed wildernesses of this continent. It bore the title of The New World, and was full of the falsest prophecy, soberly written, and with so evident a conviction of its truth, that it was difficult to believe it a description of so prosperous and fair a land. Cosily nestling in a land of mercies—the forest alive with game of every kind, from the herds of buffalo that shook the far prairies to the cunning quail that hid in the grass at your very feet, the waters full of speckled trout and all kinds of tit-bits for the angler—these unpretending people had never found it in their hearts to believe the red man an institution to be exterminated like the wild beasts of the mountains. They thought, simple souls, that as God had made them and given them the wilderness and the prairie for their own, the white man ought to be content with a share and take it thankfully.

If they could only have a lesson or two, now!

And so these pure innocent lives passed on amidst odors of pine and cedar, the songs of birds and the flaming flowers, until Louis was eighteen and Leonie fifteen.

I shall not try to paint the exquisite beauty of this blossoming maidenhood, the hues of the young cheek delicate as the petals of the wild rose, the graceful slender limbs, flexible and strong as the wild elk of her own mountains, nor yet the dark, brave face of Louis; it matters not, they loved each other.

Their gentle courtship had gone on so calmly and naturally from childhood, that they were surprised one day to find themselves betrothed. Then they were garlanded with flowers by their companions; standing in the centre of a circle they danced around them, and suddenly breaking the charmed ring, away they fled, their merry friends following, each one striving for the first kiss. For this was a promise of a speedy wedding to the fortunate possessor.

Diligently the affianced lovers set to work. Louis must build an additional room to the little cot left by his uncle. And had not Leonie a pretty carpet to make, and vast piles of linens to look over, for so important an occasion?

Day after day we heard the stroke of Louis' axe ringing in the woods, and in the cottage of the weaver the shuttle flew back and forth across the warp with cheerful industry.

But with all this preparation—a labor as pretty as two gay twittering birds bringing tiny sticks and moss to build their nest, and peeping shyly from side to side to see if they were watched—they found time to continue their long rambles, for the wedding would be in Christmas week, and they must have all the little luxuries their hills afforded for their dear friends.

It was after one of those long rambles in the afternoon of a smoky, hazy day, in what is called the Indian summer, that Leonie, complaining of fatigue, lay down in a bed of dry moss, with Louis and his hound for watchers.

Lazily, for a while she peered through half-closed eyes at the crimson banners of the maples, stirring in the faint breeze; the silvery quivering ash tree, whose leaves, like exquisitely magnetic and sensitive spirits, feel breaths of cold or glows of heat too faint for the coarser natures that surround them. She listened to the shrill call of the jay, the gleeful song of the robin, and the low whistling of Louis, who sat playing with his dog and watching the far off ripples of the lake.

But gradually all sights and sounds died away; the maples faded, the bark of the nimble squirrels grew fainter, the dropping nuts sounded thousands of miles away, and Leonie drifted from the soft twilight of dreams to the utter stillness and darkness of sleep.

From which sleep she was roused by the loud barking of Louis' dog, who ran frantically to her, whining piteously, and then darting to a great half-dead tree overhanging the water. At the foot of the tree, whose root grew in a cliff overhanging the deepest part of the lake, lay Louis' coat and a gun; half way up the tree was a broken limb, and at the top a bright winged bird hung, caught across two twigs, its blood dropping on the boughs below; out from the shore floated a huge branch of the tree, and further still a straw hat.

In vain the wild voice of the despairing girl called "Louis! Louis!" Only the far hills caught the sounds and sent them back in mocking echoes; vainly, too, did the best divers go down to the pebbled floor of this clear lake. Neither human eye nor iron grappler ever found aught of the poor boy, save his straw hat.

Night after night the Indians, with birch torches and canoes would skim the lake, and they declared that oftentimes a white spectral face with dark hair rode before them in a strange canoe made of the dead branch of a tree; but as often as they approached, it would glide away and be lost in the waves.

And for months, until the snows fell heavily and the lake froze over, was the search continued, but without success; and every day the pale face of the discolorate Leonie grew thinner and fuller of shadow. And when again the Spring put on its mantle of grass, and the old forest woke with the glad voices of returning birds, her step grew brighter and her face happier; for now, bearing his gun and followed by his hound, she would spend hours and hours around the old haunts, gathering the flowers as in the old dear days.

In constant rambling, hunting and fishing, with only his faithful dog for companion, the summer passed. And when again the Indian-summer came, she would spend days lazily floating on the waveless lake, sometimes gathering aquatic plants, but oftener peering wistfully in its pure depths, and slowly drifting about wherever the idle ripples might bear her. While on the bank she would sleepily watch Fido. One day the village was startled by the fearful howls of this dog, and, following him to the lake, they saw the gun on the ground and a bark canoe, one she had always used, floating bottom upward in the shallow water among the lilies.

In this canoe, caught, somehow, in its bark edge, was a black ribbon to which was suspended a pale blue lava heart.

This had been given Leonie by a celebrated priest; it had been blessed by the Pope, and was thought to possess the power to keep its wearer from harm. Whether it referred to harm spiritual or temporal, we do not know; but we question if this weary-hearted girl could have desired a gentler death than this, in the waters of her own lake, pure and clear, with a rosy sky overhead, and the white pebbles underneath. On closer examination this little heart was found to be broken; whether it was so while yet she wore it, or whether at her death only it was not known, but it was completely severed, save one little corner that held it together.

And thereafter they called this lake "Creve-Cœur"—the Lake of the Broken Heart.

Of the little Norman village but one log house remains—the cottage of Victor Dorée. For years it was never entered, but stood without a human foot to break the cobwebs that veiled the door. It is now occupied by an old woman, toothless and wrinkled, yet with faint traces of great beauty, for she was born to the parents of Leonie a year after the body of the drowned girl was at rest.

She is the last of her race. The tribe of Indians that once roamed free and unharmed over these hills have passed away; the pestilence and the lawless hatred of the white man have driven them to the mountain fastnesses or the grave. But every year, in the Indian-summer time, these red men bore witness that two canoes floated at midnight, one made of the birch bark, the other the branch of a dead tree, on the enchanted lake among the lilies. For this I cannot vouch, but in an old, old graveyard, overgrown with weeds and flowers, there is a white stone cross, mouldy and mossy, bearing the names of Louis and Leonie.

NEW BOOKS.—To the house of Roman & Co. we are indebted for books fresh by the last steamer: The Seer, by Leigh Hunt; Essays, Moral, Political and Aesthetic, by Herbert Spencer; Eliana, a collection of Lamb's charming essays and poems; Idyls of Battle, poems by Miss Laura C. Redden; The Merchant Mechanic, by Mary A. Howe; Dora Darling, the Daughter of the Regiment; the illustrated History of Cock Robin, and an illuminated edition of the interesting adventures of A Frog who Would a Wooing Go. In this connection we cannot do better than call attention to Roman's advertisement of holiday books in another column.

The Olympic Club gave an entertainment in aid of their Building Fund at Union Hall last evening. It passed off successfully; the performances were excellent, proving that we have gymnasts among us in these days who can challenge the athletes of other cities. We hope that a sufficient sum was netted from this, the first, exhibition, to encourage the Club in giving a series of entertainments; for the physical education of our young men is an object of paramount importance.

ANCIENT AND MODERN BETHLEHEM.

[THE Rev. Dr. Newman, in a late work, From Dan to Beersheba, gives a description of "Bethlehem of Judah" and the "Grotto of the Nativity." Its appropriateness to the present season—the commemoration of a pious festival in which the whole world joins—induces us to make the following extracts:—]

SO long as childhood continues, Bethlehem will be cherished by the young, and recalled with delight by those of riper years. The Synonym of helpless infancy, mothers will revert to it with hope, and the children of each generation will claim it as their common heritage. As here the young mother pressed her tender offspring to her bosom for the first time, Bethlehem must ever remain the symbol of domestic affections and privacies.

Originally called "The House of Bread," and now "The House of Flesh," its Arabic name, Beit Lahm, contains the significance of its wondrous history. To distinguish it from Bethlehem belonging to the tribeship of Zebulun, it is called by the sacred historian "Bethlehem of Judah;" to preintimate its fruitfulness, it was prophetically designated Ephrathah; to illustrate its rising glory "among the thousands of Judah," it was announced as the birthplace of Him "whose goings forth have been from of old." In antiquity coeval with the oldest cities in the world, its identity is unquestioned. Stretching backward thirty-six centuries, its authentic history opens with the mournful death and burial of the beautiful Rachel; and rendered imperishable by the sepulchral monument to that beloved wife, 600 years later it was the scene of the touching story of Boaz and the youthful widow of Chilion. Giving birth to Obed, the father of Jesse, Bethlehem, less than 100 years subsequent to the marriage of Ruth and Boaz, was the birthplace of David, where, at the tender age of seventeen, he was anointed king over Israel; and, in honor of events so illustrious, it thereafter was called the "City of David." During the reverses which befell Saul of Gibeath it was captured by the Philistines, and David, having been declared a public enemy, was compelled to fly to the cave of Adullam.

After 1000 years of comparative oblivion, Bethlehem suddenly emerged from obscurity into brighter and more enduring glory. Summoned by the Emperor Augustus to their native city to be taxed, Joseph and Mary came from the hills of Nazareth, and reaching the town at the close of the day, after a journey of eighty miles, the mother of the Messiah was compelled to lodge in the stable, "because there was no room for them in the inn." That night the Prince of Peace was born; the race commenced its life anew; angels sang the song of the nativity; wondering shepherds hastened to pay homage to the new-born King; a lone but marvelous star arrested the attention of the magi of Arabia Felix; and Bethlehem rose to be "greatest among the thousands of Judah."

An event so great and memorable has rendered the city of the Saviour's birth a holy shrine, at which the devout of all ages and countries have bowed with unspeakable delight. And, in commemoration of the event, and to rescue the site from oblivion, the Emperor Constantine, in the commencement of the fourth century, ordered the erection of a magnificent basilica over the "Grotto of the Nativity," which is now the oldest monument of Christian architecture in the world. Separated from the town by a long esplanade, the church occupies the eastern brow of the hill on which the city is built, and, together with the three convents abutting from its sides, forms an enormous pile of limestone, vast in dimensions, irregular in outline, and, though it is destitute of external architectural grandeur, the size, strength, and commanding position of the edifice render it the chief attraction of the place. The Greeks, Latins, and Armenians hold joint possession of the basilica, and adjoining it are the monasteries for the entertainment and devotion of their respective orders.

It was late one evening in the month of April that I rapped for admission at the iron door of the Latin convent. The Franciscans received me kindly, and, after a generous meal, an aged monk led me to my apartments for the night. The convent bells called me early from my slumbers, and, ascending to the broad, flat roof of the monastery, I enjoyed an extensive view of the surrounding country. The sky was soft, the air pure, and the sun was just rising above the mountains of Moab. The shepherd's shrill voice mingled with the tinkling of bells as he led his flock in search of pasture, and the leaves of orange, fig, and olive trees shone like jewels as the dew-drops thereon reflected the morning light. Far away to the east are the Plains of the Jordan, the mountains of Gilead, Moab, Ammon, and Seir; on the north the Hills of Judea are bleak; on the west they are green as far as the eye can reach toward the "Great Sea;" on the south are the Garden of Urta and the Pools of Solomon. With a mind attuned by such a scene, I read the romantic story of Ruth and Boaz, the history of David's coronation, and the more tender narrative of the Saviour's birth. The past returned with all the reality of the present, and history repeated its wondrous deeds before the eye of a sublime faith. * * *

Descending through the long halls of the monastery, we found the monks differently engaged; some were arranging their scanty toilets, others repeating their prayers. On each door is a rude picture illustrating the faith of the inmate, and the subject he desired to be most frequently reminded of. On one is a coffin; on another are the lambent flames of Purgatory; but on most is the serene face of Mary. My guide rejoined me in the hall of the refectory, and led me to the stable of blessed memory. Passing through the Latin chapel, where a priest was celebrating mass, we descended a flight of narrow winding steps, cut in the native rock, at the foot of which is the sacred grotto. Thirty-eight feet long, eleven wide, and two deep, it has the appearance of having been the cellar of a Syrian house, which, according to a custom still prevalent, serves as a stable. Near the eastern end is the supposed place of our Lord's birth, marked by a white marble slab, in the centre of which is large silver star, encircled with an inscription in Latin, "Here Jesus Christ was born of the Virgin Mary." Sixteen silver lamps shed a perpetual light upon the shrine; from golden censers incense unceasingly ascends, while the walls are covered with silk embroidered with gold. To the south is the substituted manger, the original having been carried to Rome and deposited in the church of Santa Maria Maggiore. Above it is a fine picture of the birth-scene by Maello, and near it is a better one of the Magi. A narrow passage leads to the small grotto where Joseph is said to have stood at the moment our Lord was born, and in it is a picture representing the angel warning him to take the young child and his mother and escape into Egypt. The angel's face is expressive of intense earnestness; the countenance of Joseph is calm and thoughtful; while Mary tenderly but firmly clasps her infant to her bosom. * * *

A native of Nablous, and born in the beginning of the second century, Justin Martyr describes the birthplace of Jesus "as a grotto in Bethlehem;" one hundred years later, Origen refers to the fact as recognized by Christians and pagans; and, a century after him, Eusebius mentions it as an accepted traditional spot, and as so regarded prior to the time of St. Helena's visit. Crediting the tradition, the mother of Constantine caused to be erected the present basilica in the year 327 A. D., and fifty years after its erection, Jerome of Dalmatia, with Paul and Eustachia, settled in Bethlehem, where the great "Father of Church History" expired, in 420 A. D., in his ninetieth year. Though the city fell into the hands of the Moslems at a later period, and the church was stripped of its ornaments, yet the cave remained undisturbed; and, on their approach to Jerusalem, the Crusaders retook Bethlehem, and in 1110 A. D., Baldwin I. elevated it to the dignity of an episcopal see; and, notwithstanding the vicissitudes through which it has passed, it is now a thoroughly Christian town.

The situation of Bethlehem is peculiar. Located on a narrow ridge projecting eastward from the central mountain range, and breaking down in the form of terraced slopes, it is bounded on the east, north, and south by deep valleys. Constructed of white limestone, well built, square in form, and crowned with small domes, the buildings rise above each other in somewhat regular gradations. The streets are few and narrow, and though the city is not surrounded with a wall, it has two gates, which are closed at night. Sweeping in graceful curves around the ridge, and regular in their ascent as stairs, the well-kept terraces are adorned with the vines of Eshcol, and with fig and olive-trees. Extending from the base of the hill toward the south and east are the fertile plains where Ruth gleaned, and where the glory of the Lord shone around the peaceful shepherds.

Numbering over three thousand souls, the modern Bethlehemites are superior in their appearance to the citizens of any other town in Palestine. The men are of light complexion, with finely developed forms, and, in their affable demeanor and noble bearing toward the "stranger within their gates," are not unworthy descendants of Boaz. In the regularity of their features, the freshness of their complexion, and the sweetness of their countenance, the women are not unlike those of America; and as if the Saviour had bequeathed the beauty of his childhood to the children of his native city, they are exceedingly fair. So thoroughly Christian in sentiment are the inhabitants, that no Moslem is allowed a residence within the town. The Cross is unrivaled by the Crescent, and Christ reigns supreme where he was born. While most of the people are either peasants or shepherds, others are the manufacturers of "pious wares," such as beads, crosses, rings, crucifixes, and models of the Holy Sepulchre, wrought out of olive-wood and mother-of-pearl.

PERSONAL APPEARANCE OF OUR SAVIOUR.—Of the personal appearance of the Saviour of mankind, people generally have but the most vague conceptions, even these having their origin in the numerous portraits passing as likenesses of that divine personage, "who spake as man never spake."

He is thus described by Lentulus, a ruler in Judea, in a letter addressed by him to the Senate of Rome, during the reign of Tiberius Cæsar: "Conscript Fathers—There appeared in these our days, a man of great virtue, named Jesus Christ, who is yet living among us, and of the Gentiles is accepted for a prophet of the truth, but his own disciples call him the son of God. He raiseth the dead and cureth all manner of diseases. A man of stature somewhat tall and comely, and in proportions of his body, well shaped, and his hands and arms delectable to behold, with a very reverend countenance, such as the beholder may both love and fear. His hair is of the color of a filbert fully ripe, to his ears, whence downwards it is more orient of hue, somewhat curling or waving about his shoulders. In the midst of his head is a seam or partition of hair after the manner of the Nazarites. His forehead is plain and delicate. His cheeks without spot or wrinkle, beautiful with a comely red; his nose and mouth exactly formed. His beard is thick, of the color of his hair: not of any great length, but forked. His look is innocent and mature. His eyes gray, clear and quick. In reproving he is awful; in admonishing courteous and friendly; in speaking, very temperate, moderate and wise. It cannot be remembered that any have seen him laugh, but many have seen him weep. A being for his singular beauty surpassing the children of men."

A CLAUDE MELNOTTE OF REAL LIFE—HOW A COMMON GARDENER FELL IN LOVE WITH THE EMPRESS EUGENIE.—A notable gossip writes for a British periodical this singular story of a gardener in love with the Empress:

"Poor Jules was a gardener's lad from Provence, young and inexperienced, but at the same time very good looking and innocent. He had entered the service of the imperial gardener at Fontainebleau three years ago, or just at the time when their Majesties made their long and memorable stay there. Jules, with some assistants, had the management of the above-mentioned garden; and performed his duties faithfully. Almost daily, at an early hour, a tall beautiful lady descended the palace-steps, walked among the flower-beds, bowed kindly to the workmen, and disappeared as she had come. On one occasion, Jules ventured to offer her a bouquet, which she received with a smile of thanks; she also inquired his name and his birthplace, and listened with evident sympathy to the lad's story; how he had always longed to come to Paris, how he would have liked to be a soldier, in order to go to the wars with the Emperor, how he sent his little savings home, and so on.

"The tall, beautiful lady came every morning, and the bouquet which the young hero offered her, became with each morning more splendid, and his cheeks redder, and his eyes more sparkling. Poor Jules! Once the lady even came in the company of a gentleman, like herself in plain morning-dress, but he looked stern with his dark face and black moustache, but he smiled for all that when the gardener brought his bouquet, and began to tell his story as usual. Soon after, there was a grand display of fireworks on the lake for the reception of the Queen of Holland, and the steward ordered all the persons engaged in the palace to assist on that evening. Our Jules, too, was among them; but, as he found nothing to do, he crept up to the galleries, where the spectators were seated, and among their Majesties and Princes and Princesses. Here he saw the tall, beautiful lady again; but on this occasion in a rich, lustrous dress, and with a diadem on her head that displayed all the colors of the rainbow, and he recognized the gentleman, too, in spite of his gold-laced uniform, and the broad red ribbon that covered the whole of his chest. And when a loud shout was raised of 'Vive l'Empereur! vive l'Impératrice!' the gentleman and the lady bowed on all sides.

"The next morning Jules waited in the palace-garden, but the lady did not come, but an officer so smartly dressed that the poor lad at first believed it was the Emperor himself. It was, however, only an aide-de-camp, who called him up, and said kindly to him that he was no longer to be a gardener's lad, but could become a soldier if he felt inclined. Then he gave him a letter to a great gentleman in Paris, and at the same time a small but heavy packet for his mother, with the remark that it came from the lady to whom he had given the flowers every morning. At present, our Jules has been for a long time at the school of Saumur, and if he some day become a marshal, or a general, that appears to be a necessary finale of the story. Why should I call him poor Jules, this lad who obeyed the innocent voice of his heart, and gave himself up as unsuspectingly as he did his beautiful flowers?"

ONE of C. J. Robinson's pleasant dancing and gymnastic soirées came off at Miss Aldrich's academy on Stevenson street, Friday evening. This institution affords young ladies those advantages for physical training and development which the Olympic Club furnishes to young men. Unfortunately the CALIFORNIAN'S invitation did not find its destination until the time for the entertainment was past, but unless it passed off pleasantly it was a rare exception to all its predecessors. With the gymnastic exercises proper, dancing was intermingled, and according to report "all went merry as a marriage (dumb) bell."

RALPH WALDO EMERSON thinks that the American eagle will come out of the war much less of a peacock. This is hopeful, surely. We shall be more natural, more simple in our lives and habits; truer, wiser, and, therefore, more soundly happy.

BY THE SEA.

O SAUCY, sparkling sea,
Curling along the strand,
Flashing your foam out in snowy curves,
To entrap me where I stand;
Dancing in maiden mirth
Up to the gray old beach,
Gliding away when he woos you to stay,
Forever beyond his reach.

I know you, saucy sea,
I hear what you do not say—
I have learned the secret that fills your heart
And laughs in your wild waves' play.
There is—one—who is coming home;
You have seen his white sails gleam;
You have stayed your mad flight to listen last night
For the name that he breathed in his dream.

O beautiful, purple sea,
I forgive you—but will he come?
Oh, mock at the mermaids, oh, jeer at the sands,
But happily bring him home.
I could think it was grief, not joy,
Such a fever burns in my breast,
With the evening star comes my love from afar,
And lo! the sun sinks in the West.

MISS M. E. BRADDON'S NEW NOVEL.

ONLY A CLOUD.

By the author of "Aurora Floyd," "Three Times Dead," "Lady Audley's Secret," "The Doctor's Wife," "The Outcasts," etc.

CHAPTER VII.

MAUDE HILLARY'S ADORERS.

FROM the bleak moorland on the Cornish hills, where no tree can flourish, and where the sweeping breath of the salt sea-breeze nips the tender verdure, and makes the quiet sheep wink again as they look oceanward; from the hilly district beyond Landresdale, which seems like the end of the world, and is at any rate the finishing-point of this British Isle, to the valley of the Thames, the sheltered and lovely hollow nestling under the wooded heights about the "Star and Garter" is about as great a change of scene as all England can afford. It is like the pushing away of some battered front scene which has done duty for the blasted heath near Forres, whereon Macbeth met the witches, since the days when Garriek himself represented the ambitious Thane, to reveal a glimpse of fairy-land fresh from the pencil of Mr. Beverly, with sunlit cascades glimmering here and there amongst the verdant valleys, and forest trees reflected in the calm bosom of a lake.

Mr. Hillary's place lay in a sheltered bend of the river, nearer to Isleworth than to Twickenham, a spot where the trees grew thicker and the shadows fell darker on the quiet water, and the plash of oars was less often heard than higher up the river. Mr. Hillary's house and Mr. Hillary's garden seemed to have nestled into the shadiest and most verdant nook along the river bank. It was called the Cedars, and it was a very old place, as any place so called should be. It was called the Cedars by virtue of the great trees whose spreading branches made patches of dense shadow on the lawn; and not by the caprice of a cockney builder, who christens his shelterless houses indifferently after the noblest trees of the forest. The house was an old red-brick mansion, long and low and irregular; and there is no kind of window invented for the admission of the light of heaven, and there is no species of blind devised by ingenious artisan for the exclusion of that light when it becomes obnoxious, which did not adorn and diversify the glowing crimson of the facade. Oriol windows and Tudor windows; long French windows of violet-stained glass, tiny diamond-paned casements, and noble jutting-out bays; windows with balconies, and windows with verandahs; striped linen blinds of crimson and white, and Venetian shutters of dazzling green; windows leading into conservatories, and windows opening into aviaries—all combined to bewilder the eye of the stranger who stood upon the lawn by the river looking up at Mr. Hillary's mansion.

Perhaps there never had been anywhere else so many flowers, and birds, and gold-fish, and pet dogs, collected together in an area of two and a-half acres. Banks of party-colored blossoms blazed in the sunshine on the lawn, tier above tier, like the bonnets on the grand stand at Ascot on a cup day; marble basins of limpid water, and tiny trickling fountains, twinkled and glittered in every direction; fragile colonnades of delicate iron-work, overhung with jessamine and clematis, honeysuckle and myrtle blossom, led away to bowery nooks upon the broad terrace by the river; and what with the perfume of a million flowers, the gurgling of black-birds and thrushes, the carolling of skylarks, the shrill whistling of a grove of canaries, the cooing of tropical love-birds, the screaming of parrots, and the barking of half a dozen excited lap-dogs, the stranger, suddenly let loose in Mr. Hillary's river-side Eden, was apt to yield himself up for the moment to a state of confusion and bewilderment.

The place was in itself bewildering enough for the ordinary mind: without Miss Hillary—without Miss Hillary! But when Miss Hillary came sailing out of a drawing-room window with diaphanous draperies of white and blue fluttering and spreading round her, and with all manner of yellow gold, and purple enamel absurdities dangling at her wrists and depending from the loveliest throat and the pinkest ears in Christendom—the stranger who was not provided with forty thousand a year and a coronet, the which to lay at the feet of that adorable creature, was the weakest of fools if he did not take to his heels, there and then, and fly from the Cedars, never to return thither. If he stayed he fully deserved his fate. If, looking at Maude Hillary, and knowing that he could never hope to win her for his own, he did not straightway flee from that flowery paradise beside the sunlit river, all after agonies endured by his luckless heart were only the natural consequence of his mad temerity. But then, unhappily, there are so many mad men in the world. Homburg and Baden-Baden are dangerous places, but there are crowds of deluded creatures who will haunt the dazzling halls of the Kursaal, and the elegant saloons of M. Benazet, so long as the fatal wheel revolves and the croupier cries, "Make your game, gentlemen, the game is made." What can be a more absurd spectacle than a big blundering moth whirling and fluttering about the flame of a candle? Yet the incineration of moth A will not be accepted as a warning by moth B, though he may be a witness of the sacrifice. Younger sons, and briefless barristers, earning a fluctuating income by the exercise of their talents in light literature; artists; curates, hopeless of rich preferment, came, and saw, and were conquered. The man who, being a bachelor and under thirty years of age, beheld Maude Hillary and did not fall in love with her, was made of sterner stuff than the rest of his race, and must have had in him the material for a Cromwell or a Robespierre. He must have been a stony, incorruptible, bilious creature, intended to hold iron sway over his fellow-men; and had no business in the paradise between Isleworth and Twickenham.

Shall I describe Maude Hillary as she sails across the lawn this July morning? I use the word sail, as applied to this young lady's movements, advisedly; for there was a swimming, undulating motion in her walk, which was apt to remind one of a lovely white-sailed yacht gliding far out across an expanse of serene blue water on a summer's day. Shall I describe her? No; if I do, stern critics will tell me that she is a very commonplace young person after all, when it is only my description that will be commonplace. Her complexion was specially fair and bright; but it was not because of her fair skin that she was beautiful. Her features were delicate and harmonious, but those who admired her most could scarcely have told you whether her nose was nearer to the Grecian or the Roman type—whether her forehead was low or high, her chin round or pointed. She was bewitching, rather than beautiful. For if Paris awarded the apple on purely technical grounds a thousand lovely English women might have disputed the prize with Maude Hillary. But I think Paris would have wished to give her the apple, if only for the pleasure of seeing her bright face light up into new radiance with the joy of her triumph; though in strict justice he might feel himself obliged to bestow the fruit elsewhere. Miss Hillary was bewitching; and people saw her, and fell in love with her, and bowed themselves down at her feet, long before they had time to find out that she was not so very beautiful after all.

She came winding in and out amongst the flower-beds now, and betook herself towards an open temple at one end of the terrace by the river, a temple of slender marble columns entwined with ivy and beautiful ephemeral parasites, whose gaudy blossoms relieved the sombre green. Two gentlemen, who were disporting themselves with lawn billiards, deserted that amusement and strolled over to the temple. They went slowly enough, because they held it vulgar to be in a hurry, and they were very young, and very much used up as to all the joys and sorrows and excitements of this earth; but they were over head and ears in love with Miss Hillary notwithstanding.

She was not alone. She never was alone. She had for her constant associates from four to half a dozen pet dogs, and Miss Julia Desmond, her companion. Miss Desmond was by no means the despised companion so popular in three-volume novels. She was a very dignified young lady, whose father had been a colonel in ever so many different armies. She was one of the Desmonds of Castle Desmond, near Limerick, and there were three peerages in her family, to say nothing of one extinct earldom, forfeited by reason of high treason on the part of its possessor, the revival of which, for his own benefit, had been the lifelong dream of Patrick Macnamara Ryan O'Brien Desmond, until death let fall a curtain on that and many other fond delusions which had survived unchanged and changeless to the last in the eternal boyhood of an Irishman's nature.

Julia was a very dignified young lady, and had been highly educated in a Parisian convent, whence she had returned to the south of Ireland to find the impress of decay upon every object around her, from the grass-grown roofs of the cottages in the lane below the castle boundary to the shattered figure of the brave old colonel. She returned in time to attend her father's death-bed, to which Lionel Hillary, his oldest friend and largest creditor, was summoned by an imploring letter from the old colonel. To Mr. Hillary the old man confided his penniless daughter. He had nothing to leave her but a set of old fashioned garnet ornaments which had belonged to her mother, and to which he fondly alluded as the "family jewels;" he had nothing to leave her except this antique trumpery, and his blessing; but he confided her to his largest creditor, having a vague impression that the largeness of the debt and the heavy interest he would have given upon all the money lent him by his friend, had he ever lived to return the principal, laid Mr. Hillary under a kind of obligation to him. However it was, the London merchant promised to be a friend and protector to Julia Desmond, and as soon as the colonel's funeral was over carried her back to London with him, and established her in his own house, as the companion of his daughter. A young lady more or less of little consequence in such an establishment as the Cedars, so the merchant thought very lightly of what he did for Miss Desmond, and Maude Hillary was delighted to have a friend who was to be her perpetual companion; a friend who could sing a good second to any duet, and was never out of time in "Blow, Gentle Gales," whenever a masculine visitor with a good bass organ was to be procured for the third in that delicious glee. The two girls drove together, and walked together, and rode together; and played duets on one piano and on two pianos, or a harp and piano; and went out together to make water-color sketches of their favorite bends in the river, with very blue water and very green willows, and a man in a scarlet jacket lazily pushing a ferry-boat away from the shore, and a Newfoundland dog, very black and white and spotty, lying on the bank.

Julia Desmond led a very pleasant life, and there were people who said that the colonel's daughter was a most fortunate person; but for Julia herself there was just one drop in the cup which was bitter enough to change the flavor of the entire draught. She was not Maude Hillary. That was Miss Desmond's grand grievance. She brooded over it sometimes when she brushed her hair of a night before the big looking-glass in her pretty chintz-curtained chamber at the Cedars. Maude had two cheval glasses that swung upon hinges at each side of her dressing table, and Maude had her own maid to brush her hair, but Julia was fain to smooth her own dark tresses. Miss Desmond thought of her grievance very often of a night, when she contemplated her face by the light of a pair of wax candles, and pondered upon the events of the day. She was not Maude Hillary. She was not sole heiress to one of the largest fortunes—so ran the common rumor—ever won by city merchant. She had not received half the attention that had been bestowed upon Miss Hillary during that day. And if not, why not? Was it not because she was less good-looking? Certainly not. Miss Desmond was a handsome girl, with bold, striking features, and her black eyes flashed indignation upon the other eyes in the glass at the mere thought of any personal superiority on the part of Maude Hillary. Was it because she was less accomplished? No, indeed. Whose thumbs were the strongest and did most execution in a fantasia by Thalberg? Whose right little finger was clearest and steadiest in a prolonged shake? Whose figures in a water-colored sketch stood firmest on their legs? Miss Desmond's, of course. But Maude was rich and Julia was poor, and the meanness of mankind was testified by the absurd devotion which they all exhibited for the heiress. Julia was really fond of Maude, and thought her tolerably pretty; but she did not comprehend the grand fact that Miss Hillary was one of the most fascinating of women, and that she herself was not. She was handsome and stylish, and accomplished and well-bred, but she was not bewitching. When Maude spoke in a friendly manner to any masculine acquaintance, he was apt to be seized with a mad impulse that prompted him to kiss her then and there, though eternal banishment from her divine presence would be his immediate doom. Even women had something of the same feeling when Miss Hillary talked to them; and perhaps this may be attributed to the fact that her mouth was the best and most expressive feature in her face. Such heavenly smiles, such innocently and unconsciously bewitching variations of expression played perpetually about those lovely lips, that the harshest woman-hater might have been betrayed into the admission that amongst nature's numerous mistakes Maude Hillary's creation was an inexcusable one. Fortune hunters who came with mercenary aspirations, remained to be sincere. Rich young stockbrokers who speculated amongst themselves upon the extent of Lionel Hillary's wealth, would have gladly taken Maude to wife, "ex everything." But Julia Desmond could not understand all this, and she regarded her benefactor's daughter as a feminine image of the golden calf, before which mercenary mankind bowed down in servile worship.

The two girls seated themselves in the little temple, and worshippers came round and performed their homage. But Miss Hillary had more to say to her dogs than to the loungers on the lawn.

"Good morning, Captain Masters.—Floss, you are the naughtiest darling.—Haven't I told you once before, Scrub, that Houton lace is not good to eat?—Papa has not come home yet, I suppose, Mr. Somerset? That tiresome city makes a kind of orphau of me, doesn't it, Julia? We never have papa to go with us anywhere now, do we, Julia?—No, Peasblossom, anything but a locket with papa's hair in it. That must not be worried.—When are we to go to the fête, Captain Masters?"

The captain shrugged his shoulders. He was very young, and held everything upon earth, except Maude, in supreme detestation and contempt.

"As from four to five is about the hottest period in the entire day, I believe the fête is supposed to be at its best somewhere between four and five," he said; "we manage these things so remarkably well in England."

"But as the Duke and Duchess are both French, I suppose the management of the fête at the Chateau de Bourbon is French, too, isn't it?" asked Miss Desmond.

Mande was occupied with a Scotch terrier who was making ferocious snaps at the jasmine trailing from the roof above her. She would have made a charming subject for Mr. Frith, with the dog held up in her hands, and the loose white muslin sleeves falling back from those fair rounded arms in soft cloudy folds.

"The Duke and Duchess are very charming," said Mr. Somerset; "and when one thinks that if they'd lived in seventeen ninety-three, instead of eighteen forty-eight, they'd have been inevitably guillotined on the Place Louis Quinze, instead of being comfortably settled in the neighborhood of Isleworth, one feels an extraordinary kind of interest in them as living illustrations of the improvement of the times. But apart from that, Miss Hillary, don't you think the fête a bore? Don't you think any charity fête more or less a bore? I can understand people sending you a subscription list, and telling their man to wait in your hall till you write a cheque for them; but I can't understand people choosing the hottest day in a hot summer to parade about a garden grinning and smirking at one another, and giving exorbitant prices for things they don't want."

"But you mean to go to the fête, Mr. Somerset?"

"Most decidedly, if I am to have the honor of going with you—and Miss Desmond."

Miss Desmond, with one flash of her black eyes, expressed her appreciation of the little pause that had preceded Mr. Somerset's mention of her name.

"Yes, I suppose we are to take you with us," said Mande, with cruel carelessness. "Papa said that if he were not at home at three, we were to go without him, and he would meet us at the chateau—and it's past three now, I declare, Julia, and we're not dressed," added Miss Hillary, looking at her watch; and papa is always so particular about punctuality. Isn't it Lord Nelson who won the battle of Trafalgar through always being an hour beforehand? I almost wish the French had beaten him, for then people couldn't have quoted him against one perpetually. Will you order the carriage, Julia, dear?—or will you tell them about it, Mr. Somerset? The landau with the bays; papa said the bays were to be used to-day. Now, Julia dear."

The two girls ran away to dress, and re-appeared in about twenty minutes, Julia very splendid in a golden brown silk dress and a pale pink bonnet; Miss Hillary in cloud-like garments of lace, or tulle, or areophane, that were especially becoming to her tall, slender figure, and the fragile style of her beauty. Maude Hillary was a very extravagant young lady, and had carte blanche at Messrs. Howell and James's, on whose account her father was wont to write heavy cheques at long intervals, without any investigation of the items; but Miss Hillary very seldom wore silk dresses, which are, after all, about the most economical thing a lady can wear. She affected gauzy fabrics, all festoons and puffings and flounces, which were thrown aside for the profit of her maid after the third time of wearing, and ultimately figured in second-hand wardrobe repositories in the dreariest outskirts of Pinlickia. Indeed, one devoted admirer of Miss Hillary, penetrating Vauxhall bridgewards from Ecclestone Square, had been startled by the apparition of his lovely partner at a recent ball, dangling limply, rosebuds and all, from a peg in a dingy shop-window.

Maude was very extravagant; but then how could she well be otherwise? Her appreciation of "pounds" was very little above that of Mr. Harold Skimpole. She very rarely had any money; if she wanted shillings she borrowed them—by the handful—of the housekeeper at the Cedars. But, on the other hand, she had unlimited credit everywhere. A beggar, or one of the churchwardens of Isleworth armed with a plate after a charity sermon, were about the only persons who ever demanded ready money from her. She had a vague idea that there was no limit to her father's wealth, and that she was to have as much of it as was required for her own uses whenever she married, if he approved of her marriage; and if he did not approve, she would not have the money, and would be poor, and live in a pretty cottage somewhere in the neighborhood of St. John's Wood, without so much as a pair of ponies to drive in the Park. She looked forward very vaguely to this sort of thing, always believing that the most indulgent of fathers would come by-and-bye to smile upon penniless Harcourt Lowther, and that everything would end happily, as it does in a comedy. She sighed now and then, and told her confidante, Julia, that she was the most miserable of creatures when she thought of poor dear Harcourt slaving himself to death in that dreadful Van Diemen's Land; but, on the whole, she bore her separation from her affianced lover with considerable resignation. Was she not by nature a bright and hopeful creature? and had she not from babyhood inhabited a kind of fairy circle, separated from all the common outer world by a golden boundary, sheltered from every rude breath of heaven by a limitless canopy of bauk notes?

CHAPTER VIII.

AT THE CHATEAU DE BOURBON.

The chateau in which some of the banished descendants of Louis the Great had set up their household gods, in the shape of a most exquisite collection of artistic treasures, was only a mile or so distant from Mr. Hillary's house. It was an old red-brick mansion like the Cedars; and, indeed, the banks of the Thames seem specially rich in red-brick mansions of the early Georgian period. It was a noble old house, and had extended itself of late years on either side, until it was almost palatial of aspect. It was a very pretty house, filled to overflowing with art treasures, about almost every one of which there hung a history as interesting as the object itself. Royalty, the banished royalty of France, inhabited that simple suburban mansion, and on the smooth lawn where the pennants were flying and the band playing, a quiet-looking gentleman moved about among the visitors, whose grave and noble face was the exact reproduction of another face, to be seen in stained marble under a glass case within the mansion; the face of a gentleman who, in the course of an adventurous career, won some little distinction under the style and title of Henry IV., King of France and Navarre.

It was almost like going back into the past for an hour or so to lounge on that sunny lawn at Twickenham, so strange yet so familiar were some of the names that were heard on the lips of the crowd. There was a mournful kind of interest in those historic titles, and the aspect of the pretty flower-festooned marquees, where elegant women were charging fabulous prices for all manner of absurdities in the way of Berlin wool, recalled the image of tented plains and fields of cloth of gold, in the days when the sons of St. Louis had other and more high-sounding business in this world than such gentle works of charity as occupied them pleasantly enough to-day.

Maude Hillary was in her glory in the garden of the Chateau de Bourbon. She had plenty of ready money for once in a way: a crisp little bundle of five-pound notes, which her father had brought from the city on the previous evening; and she distributed her wealth freely among her fashionable stall-keepers, loading herself and her attendant cavaliers with wax dolls and Berlin wool work, stereoscopes, antinaccassars, painted fire-screens, bottles of toilette vinegar, and feather flowers. She knew a great many people, and she was so bright, and animated, and happy-looking, that people who were utter strangers to her watched her with a feeling of interest, and asked one another who she was. She was standing amidst a group of aristocratic acquaintances upon the terrace overlooking the river, when she cried out that her papa had arrived, and ran away to meet him, leaving Julia Desmond and the two young men behind her.

"An hour after your time, papa," she said, putting both her hands into his, "and I've spent all my money, and I've bought these for you." She flourished a pair of gorgeously embroidered slippers before his eyes, and then put her arm through his with an air of proprietorship that was as charming as everything else she did.

Lionel Hillary, Australian merchant, of Moorgate street, London, was a handsome-looking man, tall, and stout, and dark, with iron-gray hair and whiskers, and very unlike his daughter in every respect; for the happy brightness which was the chief element of her beauty found no reflection in his face. He looked very grave and a little careworn; and Maude, watching him closely, said presently:

"I'm afraid you have one of your headaches again to-day, papa."

"Yes, my dear: I've been working rather hard this morning. Let me introduce you to this gentleman, whom I have induced to come and spend a little of his money for the benefit of the Duchess's poor people."

This gentleman was Mr. Francis Tredethlyn, who had been loitering a little in the rear of Lionel Hillary while the merchant talked to his daughter. The two men had become acquainted with each other in the simplest possible manner. Amongst the property Francis Tredethlyn had inherited from his uncle was a bundle of shares in a certain Australian insurance company of which Mr. Hillary was a director. Francis, wanting to make some inquiry about the shares, had been advised to go to Mr. Hillary, and had done so. He found the merchant very cordial and friendly—he had found a great many people in these dispositions towards him lately—and with the frankness natural to him had told a good deal of his story to that gentleman; always avoiding any allusion to his cousin Susan. Lionel Hillary, being very much pleased with his manner, and being generally very kind and hospitable to any young man who came in his way, offered to drive his new acquaintance down to Twickenham.

"You must find Loudon miserably dull at this time of year!" he said. "There's a fête, or a fancy fair, or something of that kind, our way. I'll drive you down, and you shall dine at my place afterwards."

Thus it was that Francis Tredethlyn found himself upon the lawn before the chateau de Bourbon, making what he felt to be a very awkward bow, and most heartily wishing that some convulsion of nature might open a ready-made grave in the smooth turf on which he stood, wherein he might hide himself from the bright eyes of Miss Hillary.

She spoke to him in the easiest, friendliest manner; asked him if he had ever been at the chateau before; if he liked a fancy fair; hoped he meant to spend ever so much money. She opened her eyes very wide as she said this, and he saw how blue they were, and then felt an actual blush kiuding under his brown skin. Such a woman as this had never before walked by his side, talking to him and smiling at him. He answered her animated inquiries as best he might, and found himself thinking of all manner of incongruous things—of Maude Hillary's blue eyes and point-lace parasol, of his own awkwardness and ignorance, of the narrow points of her dove-colored boots, as they peeped from under her dress now and then, like anything in the world you like except Sir John Suckling's micc, of the old farmhouse on the Cornish moorland, of little Susy in a white dainty sun-bonnet.

He had never been in such a place before, mixing on equal terms with well-dressed men and women, about most of whom even he, in despite of his ignorance, recognized a nameless something that stamped them as superior to the common run of well-dressed people. That in itself was enough to bewilder him. He had never before seen such a woman as Maude Hillary; and even experienced young men from Government offices found Maude Hillary bewildering. He felt terribly embarrassed and out of place, and after undergoing a sharp ordeal on the terrace, where he was introduced to Miss Desmond and to the young men staying at the Cedars, he was not a little rejoiced to find himself free for a few minutes, while Mr. Hillary and his daughter talked to a group of new arrivals. He strolled away to the end of the terrace, and lounged upon the marble balustrade, looking down at a lane below, a kind of gorge cut through two separate gardens, in which some of the common folks of the neighborhood were gathered, listening to the music of the band, and staring at the splendid line of carriages waiting for the guests in the gardens above.

"I didn't think I was such a fool as to let my brains be muddled like this by a lot of fine dresses, and parasols, and flower-beds, and the playing of a brass band," he thought; "they're flesh and blood, just as much as my mother that's dead and gone, or poor little Susy. But when I looked at her just now, it seemed as if there was a light shining all about her somehow, that almost blinded me. She spoke to me as prettily and as kindly as she spoke to her father; and yet I feel more afraid of her than if she'd been my uncle Oliver, and a little boy again tumbling down his corn in the valley farm."

He moved a little way from the balustrade, and stood looking rather sheepishly towards the group he had left, doubtful whether he was expected to rejoin them or to stroll about by himself, and amusing himself as he pleased. He would have given a great deal of money for the poorest treatise on etiquette which would have told him as much as this; and in the meantime he lingered where he was, twirling a very big pair of lavender gloves which he had bought—through the agency of Mr. Hillary's groom, and with no reference to their adaptability to his own hands—on the way down.

Lingering thus, doubtful of himself, and painfully conscious of being very much out of keeping with the scene around him, he still thought of all manner of incongruous things; and among other fancies one special thought, which could have had no possible connection with the events of the day, kept surging up towards the troubled sea of his recollections.

"I never loved my cousin Susan," he thought; "I know now that I never really loved my cousin Susan."

THERE never was a more graceful rejoinder than that which the putative Father of History tells of Croesus, carried off from his hoards, and dragged about among the lords in waiting on Cambyzes. "Croesus," asked the crazy tyrant, "which is the greater man—I or my father?" The captive must have known that if his adroitness failed him he would probably be offered an immediate mark for the cimetars of the escort; but it did not. "Cyrus," he replied, "was greater than you. If in other respects you are your father's equal, you will never have so great a son."

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1864.

CHRISTMAS! CHRISTMAS!!

ANOTHER Christmas, with its chimes and its cheer and its abounding merrymaking, is upon us. The last stroke of twelve to-night will usher in the most honored and the most universal as it is one of the most ancient of all Christian festivals; but falling upon the Sabbath its celebration has been postponed by common consent until the following day. Santa Claus, however, not having entered into any such arrangement and probably not having been informed of it, will be very apt to make his appearance to-night, for being an old Knickerbocker, he is beyond doubt a great stickler for regular dates and usages.

The institution of Christmas is attributed to Pope Telesphorus, who died in the year of our Lord 138—Heaven bless his memory, as all lovers of good Christmas cheer will ever pray! Although intended as a celebration of the anniversary of the Saviour's birth, it was only in the Fourth century that the 25th of December was definitely settled upon. Christmas before having been the most movable of the Christian festivals, frequently confounded with the Epiphany, and celebrated by the eastern churches in the months of April and May. In that century, St. Cyril, thinking it absurd that so many different days should be celebrated as the anniversary of so important an event, obtained from Pope Julius I. an order for an investigation concerning the day of Christ's nativity, the result of inquiry being a settlement by the theologians of the East and West upon the present date, though some of the fathers were in doubt whether a proper identification of the day had been effected. The decision, however, has been uniformly accepted, and the 25th of December is now celebrated by the whole Christian world as the birthday of Him who founded their faith. It is considered in the double light of a holy commemoration and a cheerful festival, and consequently devotion and merriment are commingled in its observance.

The manner of celebrating Christmas has varied during different ages and in different parts of the world. In the Middle Ages it was celebrated by gay, fantastic spectacles, known as "mysteries" and "moralities," the performers wearing grotesque masks and singular costumes. Christmas carols—instituted probably in remembrance of the songs of the shepherds at the birth of Christ—date from the time when the common people ceased to understand Latin. During the last days preceding Christmas it is still the custom of Calabrian minstrels to descend from the mountains of Naples and Rome, saluting the shrines of the Virgin Mother, under the poetical notion of cheering her until the birth-time of her infant at the approaching Christmas. A curious illustration of the proneness of man to reverse the order of society and ridicule its decencies, distorting even a Christian festival to serve as an occasion, is found in the so-called feasts of fools and asses, grotesque saturnalia sometimes termed "December liberties," in which everything serious was burlesqued and turned into ridicule, great men mingling in the crowd and disporting themselves like boys, and inferiors personifying their superiors in the most absurd manner. In Germany and the northern portion of Europe, Christmas is emphatically a children's holiday, the little folks coming in for the principal enjoyment. The Christmas tree has been imported by us, and it would perhaps be well if we also borrowed another custom which goes with it; the mother, after the fruit of its boughs having been distributed, taking occasion to say privately to the daughters and the fathers to the sons, what has been observed most praiseworthy and most faulty in their conduct during the year. Perhaps, too, if husband and wife made these little corrections and confidences to each other a good purpose might be served, though it is not altogether unlikely that a series of crimination and recrimination might be the result, strangely at variance with the character of the festival. Santa Claus found his parallel in Germany, where the children's presents were all sent to one person, who, dressed in high buskins, white robe, mask, and flaxen wig, and known as Knecht Rupert, went from house to house, received with great pomp by the parents and with certainly a respectful consideration by the children upon whom he bestowed the intended gifts according to the character he heard of them from the parents, after grave and careful inquiry. The custom still obtains in some of the smaller villages of Germany; more severe than the Dutch Santa Claus, Knecht Rupert sometimes birches the children if their behavior has been very bad.

In England Christmas has always been the merriest festival of the year. Begun on Christmas Eve the revels often continued until Candlemas—February 2d. Larders were filled with capons, turkeys, hens, pork-pies, geese, ducks, plums, honey, and especially the great round of beef, giving to the Italians the following proverb which they still have: "He has more business than English ovens at Christmas." The tenants went up to the hall, and the lord of the manor with his family stepped down from their habitual reserve to entertain their guests and move them to mirth.

On Christmas eve the bells were rung;
On Christmas eve the mass was sung;
That only night, in all the year,
Saw the stoled priest the chalice rear.
Then opened wide the Baron's hall,
To vassal, tenant, serf and all;
Power laid his rod of rule aside,
And Ceremony dropped his pride.
The heir with roses in his shoes
That night might village partner choose.
All hailed with uncontrolled delight,
And general voice, the happy night
That to the cottage, as the crown,
Brought tidings of salvation down.
England was merrier England when Old Christmas brought his sports again.
'Twas Christmas broached the mightiest ale;
'Twas Christmas told the merriest tale;
A Christmas gambol oft would cheer
A poor man's heart through half the year.

The Yule log—a huge block which might be burnt till Candlemas-Eve—blazed in the wide fireplace; the wassail-bowl and punch-bowls sat on the table and warmed the heart to hilarity; games were in progress, hot-cockles, fool-plough, snap-dragon and the like, and mirth and music ruled to the exclusion of cold and care. The soured boar's head, the first and favorite dish of the day, was borne to the principal table in solemn state "upon a silver platter, with ministralsye." Of this boar's head the tradition is that the custom originated at Queen's College, Oxford, from the valor of a student who, while walking and reading Aristotle, being suddenly attacked by a savage wild boar, thrust the volume down the animal's throat, crying Græcum est! and held it there till the beast was choked to death—poor fellow! he couldn't swallow Aristotle.

The custom of decking houses and churches with evergreens, common in England and rapidly coming to obtain in this country, is derived from ancient Druidical practice. According to the old belief, sylvan spirits could fly to the evergreens for protection when winter came, and there remain unpinched by frost and not inconvenienced by snow. "The holly branch shone on the old oak wall," and mistletoe, rosemary, ivy, bays and laurel furnished their bright leaves to deck the ceilings and wainscotings, where they hung until Candlemas came. A deal of kissing was done under the mistletoe in the merry days when gymnastics of the lips were practiced, but a deal more has since been done "under the rose."

It was long a superstition in England that on Christmas Eve the oxen were always to be found upon their knees, and that after the change from the old to the new style they occupied this attitude of devotion only on the eve of the old Christmas Day. It would seem easy enough for the farmers to have put this belief to a practical test, by simply watching the animals, to ascertain whether they were at prayer, at prostration, or asleep on the holy eve, but they preferred to take the story on faith. The superstition was derived from a medieval notion that an ox and an ass which happened to be present at the nativity fell upon their knees in a suppliant position.

But of Christmas legends and traditions there is no end. For instance, it is an old Swedish tradition preserved in the history of Olaus, Archbishop of Upsal, that men living in the northern and cold parts of the country were suddenly and strangely metamorphosed into wolves at Christmas time, and that, meeting together in a great multitude, they waged a more destructive warfare against everything human, and animals not fierce by nature, than they could have done were they natural wolves. We find no derivation for this rather incongruous tradition.

The present Christmas comes to Californians more pleasantly than it does to our Eastern brethren. On the Atlantic coast the air is thick and black with sulphurous smoke, and the tremendous diapason of cannon mingles with the chimes that ring in the anniversary morning of the Saviour's birth. There are few hearthstones at the East which have not some place made vacant by the year; few festive boards where some chair will not stand empty, its occupant sleeping in the silence and immutability of death beneath Virginia's red soil, or marching in the van of armies where death is borne on the swift wings of countless bullets. Here we enjoy, comparatively, the blessings of peace; the rumble of war is faintly in our ears, but a continent stretches its plains and mountains between our door-yards and the crimson-wheeled car; here only the blood of the grape reddens the soil; the only furrows in the ground are those the farmer ploughs as he puts in his seed; the only blades that flash in the sun are those the reapers wield as they gather in the harvest! Let us think of those less favored than we as we sit around our Christmas boards, and let us at least send to them of our bounty.

DRAMATIC MENTION.

MAGUIRE'S Opera House on Monday evening gave us East Lynne, Mrs. Edwin taking the character of the much-to-be-pitied lady who runs away from her husband without any cause and returns to his home in the guise of a governess and wearing green glasses, because the gentlemanly companion of her flight treats her badly and manifests an indisposition to marry her. Our readers are all aware that this is a dramatization of a popular novel—if we say that in plot and sentiment the novel is about as absurd as anything which the genius of a woman writer ever conceived, we say quite enough to indicate the real character of the play. When we say that like the book it is sensational to the last degree, we furnish a clue to the hold it has on the popular mind and the demand which it occasions among audiences for handkerchiefs and eye-washes. The daughter of an earl having married a lawyer with whom she is not much in love runs away from him with a man whom she does not love at all, simply because she fancies that her husband is in love with some one else. She expects the partner of her flight to marry her, which he very sensibly objects to doing, arguing probably that the chances are that the second husband in his matrimonial relations with her will fare similarly to the first. A renitance from her paramour, which seems to be in greenbacks instead of in gold, is rejected with disdain, and she goes back to her husband's house, where she lives for some time undiscovered as nurse to her own child, finally dying forgiven, to the sound of the usual slow music. Of course the piece offers abundant opportunity for situations and pathetic appeals, and of these Mrs. Edwin made the most, bringing abundant tears from the eyes of young ladies in the dress circle and old gentlemen in the galleries. A better tribute than the one of tears Mrs. Edwin could not ask for. Mrs. Saunders, who, by the way, in a certain line of characters is decidedly the best actress at present on our stage, did Mr. Carlyle's sister excellently well, bringing laughter from the audience in almost the same breath that Mrs. Edwin pumped up their tears. Mr. Mayo did excellent acting as Archibald Carlyle. Mr. Reeves failed as Captain Levison. The other characters, not very important ones, were tolerably well rendered by the company.

Tuesday evening witnessed a repetition of East Lynne, and Wednesday evening was celebrated by a cheerful little piece known as Raoul; or, the Robber of the Pyrenees. Thursday night, however, furnished the theatrical event of the week in the production of The Magnolia; or, The Angel of the Swamp. This is a very Octoroonish play, similar in many respects to that triumph of Boucicault's. There is a beautiful octoroon, and a young man desperately in love with her, and an embarrassed plantation, and cheating around the board. Stronger in its points as an anti-slavery tract than the Octoroon, The Magnolia has not the brilliant plot and artistic working up which characterizes the former drama. This can be said, however, without disparaging The Magnolia, for the play of which it is the companion piece is one of the most effective dramas ever put upon the stage. The daguerreotype scene, and the chase of the murderer by the Indian through the swamp, will long stand to playwrights as models where a thrilling interest is sought to be conjured up. The Magnolia has a better ending than The Octoroon, a little piece of miscegenation, or marriage, blending the two bloods of which one was slightly off color, and ending all prejudices. The principal characters fell into the hands of Mesdames Edwin, Saunders and Perry, and Messrs. Mayo, Hill, Aldrich, Anderson, Reeves and Barry. With one exception these parts were well done, and that exception lies with Mr. Reeves, who certainly is not at all competent to the line of characters assigned to him. The contrast between Charles Thorne and Mr. Reeves as "Capt. Levison" in East Lynne was so marked as to provoke comparisons very disadvantageous to the latter; but this was more marked in the "William Johnson" which Mr. Reeves assumed on Thursday evening. Thorne would have carried the character off with a grace and dash that would have sufficed of itself to carry the play over the centre, had there been a chance of its catching; but Mr. Reeves proved a hindrance to its success rather than a help. Barry came out capitally as "Mad Bill," sinking himself so effectually that very many people looked around for Barry, and were surprised to find him beneath that disguise. We pay this compliment to Mr. Barry the more cheerfully as it is the first time that he has furnished us an opportunity to conscientiously speak even tolerably well of him. Mr. Hill is ripening out as an excellent and valuable actor, manifesting a great improvement in spirit since leaving the lyric stage. He contributed greatly to the success of the late burlesques, and audiences have now come to look for good acting at his hands, and to grumble in a dissatisfied way if they do not get it. The Magnolia will be repeated until further notice. If allowed to offer a suggestion, we think the piece would be materially improved by shortening the dialogue somewhat; at present the action of the plot scarcely balances the talk.

(For the Californian.)

CHRISTMAS.

WITH Morning's first blush our two little ones woke—
Like twin roses they laughed in their bed;
For the day and their rest in the same whisper broke,
And their cheeks, like the dawning, were red.

Then their feet on the floor fell lighter than air,
Or the rain that pit-patters from eaves—
Each tiny foot, blushing because it was bare,
Seemed a rosebud with five lily leaves.

Away to the hearth-stone they stole on tip-toe,
And their laugh rang a glad Christmas hymn—
Their hearts like their stockings were ripe to overflow,
For both were filled full to the brim.

There were pea-guns and whistles and harlequin-jacks
That would dance though a monk pulled the string,
With gingerbread ponies and all the knick-knacks
That Kris Kringle is certain to bring.

Such blasts of tin-trumpets, such volleys of peas—
You'd have thought the old room a Redan:
On the parapet sofa they hastened to seize,
And Tabby, its garrison, ran.

It chanced, too, the fire-place, awhile before day,
Had been belching out smoke like a pipe,
Which gave us a wonderful fact to portray
When their minds for the wonder were ripe.

For we told them the steeds that St. Nicholas drove Did not like to stand still in the snow,
And so stabled themselves in the chimney above,
While their master filled stockings below.

The little ones firmly subscribed to this creed—
As soon they'd have doubted their prayers—
I envied their faith; we old Gentiles have need
Of a credence as ready as theirs.

Thus when legends all sacred to childish belief
Fade away, and we rank ourselves men,
The world calls us wiser—is wisdom, then, grief?
But indeed, are we wiser than then?

For oft when my soul trails her wings in the dust,
And would rest from the battlings without,
I say to my soul: Is it folly to trust?
The deepest of wisdom to doubt?

C. H. WEBB.

BELLA DONNA TO HER FRIEND.

SAN FRANCISCO, December 14, 1864.

O H, dear! what can the matter be? Are you aware, very dearest friend, that two entire weeks have rolled by, and my eyes have not been gladdened by as much as a short note from you, to acknowledge the receipt of my last letter? Now, if I felt an inclination to be severe, I should resort immediately to the lex talionis; but instead of that, like one of the best friends and correspondents in the world, I employ every leisure moment in writing to you.

You would be amused if I were to tell you how many times within the past week I have visited Wells, Fargo & Co.'s office, and inquired with a most beseeching expression if I were to be the happy recipient of a package. I really would have felt heartily ashamed of my extraordinary pertinacity, had it not been for the good-looking young gentleman attached to the New York Department, who, upon seeing me enter, always rushed to my assistance; and with a chivalric politeness, (found only in the inhabitants of the States south of Mason and Dixon's line,) made it appear as if he were the favored one, and I the conferrer. I declare, exhibitions of such disinterested courtesy are immensely refreshing! N'est-ce pas, mon amie?

The rain during the past week has been almost incessant, and as you know, Clara dear, how very sensibly my spirits are affected by the state of the weather, you will not be much surprised to learn that, even in the midst of my gay friends, I have been troubled with a slight touch of ennui, or, as Byron puts it, "that awful yawn which sleep cannot abate." Uncle George perceiving this, and desirous that every moment of my visit should be passed agreeably, suggested a variety of amusements pour passer le temps; but none seemed so well adapted to the depressed condition of my feelings as a walk down town in the rain. Laura and I accordingly put on our heavy boots and balmorals, and prepared to view Montgomery street under a cloud. Upon leaving the "Occidental," the first building that attracted my attention was the one on the corner of — street, that you and I used to regard so mysteriously on account of always observing, in one of the windows, a head, that you wilfully maintained reminded you of a disinterested spirit. I inquired for what purpose the edifice was used, and was somewhat astonished to learn that it was a club-house, nominally for the "great and glorious Union." Uncle George, who happens to be one of the members, proposed a visit to it; to this we of course joyfully assented, as Laura had told me sotto voce that she was acquainted with a number of gentlemen belonging to the association, and that they were (to use her own expression) "perfectly splendid."

The gloomy ideas that are naturally suggested upon beholding the exterior, are immediately dispelled upon ascending the broad and massive stair case that leads to the reading room. Here one cannot avoid remarking into what utter insignificance such clubs as the Union, Athenæum, and New York, of the last named city, sink by comparison; but as comparisons are invariably odious we will drop them forthwith. I was rejoiced to find that, although they number among the members natives of almost every part of the terrestrial sphere, (the king of the Cannibal Islands, I hear, has lately joined,) to our Government they are loyal "to a man," and with a highly commendable spirit of patriotism, intend to celebrate the occasion of Mr. Lincoln's installation with an illumination as brilliant in practice as was the "Veiled Prophet of Khorassan" in theory; and in order to preserve the same unity of feeling that has always existed among them, they have resolved that the first dissentient voice be obliged to assume the enormous expense of the necessary candles. I think, Clara, mie, it would be advisable for you to indite a few lines of warning to your friend, Dr. or General —, (I really forget his proper title,) for he, I believe, is the only one who is inclined to be at all contemptuous.

We were sufficiently fortunate to meet several of the members, of whom, it is scarcely necessary for me to add, Laura was not a particle too eloquent in her praises. I noticed, however, that one gentleman, upon receiving an introduction to us, exhibited a slight degree of mauvaise honte which appeared to me rather astounding in one of his apparent years; but remembering the old aphorism of l'amour et la fumée ne peuvent se cacher, I inquired if the ubiquitous little god had been playing any of his pranks in that quarter. I was answered affirmatively, and my informant told me, (after having exacted a promise of inviolable secrecy,) that the "party" in question had foolishly "loved some bright particular star, and thought to win it;" but instead of having starlight, as he had fondly hoped, his happiness all ended in moonshine. Oh, Cupid! how insertable are thy ways!

From another one of the gentlemen I fancy Washington Irving must have in a measure received his idea of Rip Van Winkle, for after a short conversation with him I discovered that he had been an eye-witness of almost every incident of any importance that had occurred in this mundane abiding-place since Adam was a baby. And although rather prone to indulge in platitudes, I found that even contact with the brusque San Franciscans, had not overlaid the manner of the courtly school in which he must have been trained.

A rather peculiar feature of this club is, I noticed, an utter disregard to the ages of the members; for, seated by the side of the gentlemanly anachronism, was a juvenile whose sapient airs amused us vastly; still I was pleased to see that one of his extreme youth should behave with such dignity when away from home. I felt very much inclined, however, to ask him if his maternal parent was cognizant of his present whereabouts; in fact was about doing so, when he turned and honored me with such an awfully supercilious stare that I succumbed instantly. I, however, did not cherish any animosity, for I remembered what a striking illustration he would prove of the wonderful precocity of Young America to the many subjects of H. B. M., by whom he was surrounded.

Uncle George now warned us that it was time we should bid adieu to our hospitable hosts, or the old saying of being made "twice glad" would be applied to us. As we had spent so much time at the club, instead of continuing our peregrinations, we were obliged to retrace our steps homewards. I was not at all sorry, for I felt that I had been sufficiently entertained for one day.

Now, my darling, I am going to surprise you with the pleasantest little piece of news in the world. Who do you suppose has returned to us again, after a short sojourn in one of the Eastern States? Why, no less a personage than the one whom you were wont to call your Apollo Belvidere. The manner in which I learned his arrival was slightly ludicrous; but feeling confident that everything concerning him is of interest to you, I will relate exactly how it occurred. As you are already aware, the window in my room at the Occidental looks on Montgomery street, and although on the first floor (from the roof,) we can plainly distinguish objects on the opposite side of the street. Yesterday afternoon my attention was attracted by a large concourse of people gathered together in front of Belden's Block. You know, dear, that a crowd has always been a sort of idiosyncrasy of mine, so I was immediately on the alert to discover the cause. In a few moments, by the aid of a powerful lorgnette, I was enabled to ascertain that the nucleus was, as might be expected, a man and a woman.

The man, who was eminently handsome, was endeavoring to extricate himself from the affectionate, though rather violent embraces of the woman, whose dulcet accent bespoke a purely Teutonic origin. It was a pathetic scene, and even from "my window's height," I could see that it brought tears to the eyes of the by-standers. As you will doubtless imagine, I was dreadfully anxious for the dénouement, so, on the impulse of the moment, I rushed frantically down-stairs, into the middle of the crowd, when, (fancy the perturbed state of my feelings!) I discovered that the excitement was caused by the meeting of your Apollo, and his ci-devant landlady who, in tones quivering with suppressed emotion, was calling him "her darling, her angel," (not Gep. Gillmore's) and other pet names of the most endearing character. As you must have anticipated, your hero was surrounded by a goodly number of those "many friends that are only bounded by his acquaintances;" but on his right hand stood Persens, who, knowing the modest disposition of his friend, was determined that "fair play" should be shown him.

Even on his countenance, however, fear was strongly depicted, for almost in the same breath that this ancient Model of Constancy was lavishing upon the one, the treasures of her unselfish (?) love, she was chiding the other with equal vehemence for his unwarrantable reticence, in not having apprised her of her "love's" intended return. O, mein Gott in Himmel! vat a country, vat a peoples!

The canaille now, evidently satisfied that neither Sémès, nor any other very alarming catastrophe had landed among us, to disturb the serenity of our peaceful garrison, went on their ways rejoicing; the demonstrative landlady was bound over to keep the peace, and the two other principal actors repaired to a neighboring saloon where they were enabled to conceal their blushes with a "smile." Well, dear! this little contre-temps is only another immutable proof of what you have always heard me assert: that passionate romance has not yet died out in Germany.

Laura, in looking over my shoulder, (rnde girl!) recognized immediately whom I meant by Persens, and was very anxious to know why we had given him that classical soubriquet; so I was obliged to tell her it was because of his having rescued Andromeda (or her picture) from the hands of some terrible sea-monster. (Pardou my ignorance, ma petite, if I have spelt that little word incorrectly; but, just at this moment, I am undecided whether it is s-e-a or s-c-c.) O, mon Dieu! there goes the dinner-gong, and I have not even thought of dressing, so, au revoir. BELLA DONNA.

MANAGER Jack Wilson, after a brief retirement from the active arena, has re-entered it with that vigor and comprehensiveness for which he is especially noted. It was suspected that all this while he was lying low for the production and perfection of something stupendous, and now he announces it. It seems that he has taken possession of the Mechanics' Pavilion, turning that immense building into a mammoth circus, which will eclipse anything of the kind ever before seen on this coast, or, for that matter, this continent. Not New York has been patterned after, nor any "pent up Utica," which that State contains; it is from Rome, Paris and London that Mr. Wilson has drawn the idea of the splendid Colosseum into which he has converted the Pavilion. Rare sport will be seen at the Pavilion during the holidays; where erst large apples, and big pumpkins, and mammoth cheeses, and quartz crushers were seen, we are now to have chariot races, driven by ladies; races, on bare-backed steeds; hurdle races; steeple chases;—but emotion chokes our pen and space fails us to enumerate all the promised attractions. Zoyara will be there, and the whole troupe of gymnasts and equestrians who have made their names horseback words all the world over. Turn to the advertisement, and then say if we err in predicting success for Mr. Wilson.

MRS. ADA CLARE, a lady who brought with her from New York the reputation of being one of the most clever feuilletonistes of the day, and who proved her claim to the title by her contributions to the literature of this coast acting as the Bulletin's correspondent during a recent sojourn at the Sandwich Islands, will make her début at Maguire's next week as "Camille." It is never safe to predict, but the lady has sufficient talent to insure her success in anything she seriously undertakes, and too much good sense, we apprehend, to attempt anything in which there was a likelihood of making a failure. Her appearance before the footlights will be an event of interest.

MAJOR Van Voast, long and favorably known to our community both as a citizen and soldier, has been ordered East for active service. The major is thus afforded an opportunity for distinguishing himself of which he will probably be swift to take advantage. At parting we can only hope that Van Voast, at his new post, on the Atlantic coast, will distinguish himself most, and become our pride and boast, as well as the young ladies' toast, in that circle where he rules the roast, and that no ugly bullet in the abdomen may cause him to give up the ghost.

MR. CHARLES WHEATLEIGH, too well known to our public to need a word said in his favor beyond the simple announcement of his engagement, will appear at Maguire's Opera House on Thursday evening of next week.

DEATH OF THE HON. J. L. DAYTON.—Despatches from New York of the 20th, mention the death of Mr. Dayton, U. S. Minister to France. He died in Paris on the 2d of December, of apoplexy.

PETROLIA.

[Petroleum seems to occupy the speculative attention of Wall street, and our mining excitement of the past two or three years there finds its parallel in oil diggings. Perhaps the same result will be obtained. "Tigg Montague," in Wilkes' Spirit of the Times, gives the following account of the establishment of a company:]

I WAS waited upon by four enterprising gentlemen in the early part of the week, who informed me that they designed to start a new Petroleum Stock Company, while the oil fever lasted, and desired that I should become its President. They offered me as an inducement fifty thousand shares of the company per annum, by way of salary. This I refused, but finally yielded for the stated sum of five hundred dollars a year in greenbacks. I believe in greenbacks. My esteemed friend Slyme believes in greenbacks. So does the company, if I am to judge from the reluctance with which they consented to appoint me on a greenback basis.

I immediately set to work. I found the company as yet unorganized. They had no petroleum lands, no oil, and no money. All was yet chaos. This I admired. It exhibited talent.

The man who seeks to make something out of something, displays a gross lack of financial ability. This I perceived to be the opinion of the company.

The first thing necessary was to organize, by electing a Board of Directors and officers for the company. This was effected without any difficulty. We all became directors by virtue of our individual votes. Every man elected himself.

The next step was to appoint the officers. This was also done by vote. By virtue of the original bargain I remained President. The next office was that of Treasurer. Upon counting the ballots it was found that again every man voted for himself. I had the casting vote, and informed the Board I should reflect upon the matter, and cast my ballot on the next day. Before the hour of meeting arrived I received private notes from every one of the Board, offering me considerable inducements to vote for them respectively. As, with one exception, these inducements were of a future and contingent character, I threw them, all but the exception, aside.

The exception proved to be Mr. Wobble. His offer was ten dollars in cash, a fancy cassimere coat, nearly new, and a season ticket to Artemus Ward's lectures. I closed with him at once, and upon counting the ballots the following list of officers was determined upon:

President,

TUGG MONTAGUE, Esq., formerly of the Anglo-Bengalee Life Assurance and Trust Company, London.

Treasurer,

CHARLES AUGUSTUS WOBBLE, Esq., of Wobbleville, Wobble county, Ohio.

Secretary,

FLAVIUS SKITTS, Esq.

Banker,

(This was merely a nominal office—to keep up appearances—seeing that every man intended to do his own banking, by Jove!)
ROBERT PRODCRAFT, Esq.

Counsel,

(This was another nominal office, seeing that every man intended to keep his own counsel, by Jingo!)
JEFFERSON E. PICKET, Esq.

A name for the company was next in order. The Treasurer suggested something romantic, as Ivanhoe, Waverly, Minne-ha-ha, Forest-Skunk, Pole-cat, or Cammophile. The suggestion was over-ruled. The Secretary selected titles from the current literature of the day, such as Pre-adamite, Infusoria, Pliocene, Miocene, Eocene, Jurassic, Socio-incombatul-animouanipusteurum, etc. Voted down unanimously. The Banker brought forward a series of names, having reference to the theory of money, such as The Medium, The Cent-per-Cent, The Buy-em-flat, The Sell-em-up, etc. etc. Condemned by a majority vote.

The Counsel suggested The Taxed-up, The Skin-em-deep, The Choke-em-down, The Brassilian, The Wind-em-up, The Attachment, etc. Brassilian made a deep impression, but, after thirty-six separate ballots, was laid on the table.

Being called upon myself, I made a modest address, advocating the adoption of a more national name for the company. I skillfully adverted to the great destiny of the country, the Rocky Mountains, and the Peninsula Campaign. I referred with glowing pride to the battles of Bull Run and Antietam, and pointed towards the Golden Gate as being the only natural boundary between San Francisco and Communipaw.

In brief, I suggested in flattering terms the patriotic and endearing name, dear alike to Americans and those who have wafted themselves o'er the sea to make a living upon her distant shores (cheers), and bare the brawny hand of speculative labor (cheers), of THE UNIVERSAL SQUASH COMPANY, capital $3,000,000, divided into 3,000,000 shares of $1 each, so that every honest tiller of the soil could have a hand in it, or put his foot into it if he pleased (cheers). Upon putting this to vote, it was carried by acclamation.

The next business before the Board of Directors of the Universal Squash Petroleum Oil Company was the preparation of a report and prospectus. Mr. Skitts had already providentially procured one from an eminent Analytical Chemist and Mining Geologist, for the consideration of the contingent possession of one hundred shares of the company. Report accepted, and prospectus ordered to be printed. The report read as follows:

"——— Esq., Secretary of the —— Petroleum Oil Company (blanks to be filled in.)

SIR: Having made a scientific examination of the property of the above company, situated in ——, I beg to submit the following report:

The mining corps, under the direction of Professor Kratzhaltgen, first penetrated the earth at eighteen points by means of Artesian wells. This examination developed the existence of petroleum in incredible quantities. No less than 40,000 barrels per day is assured of. I tasted the oil myself. It will make an excellent salad oil, and with very little difficulty may be prepared for use on the hair.

For lubricating purposes it is incomparable, and it is highly esteemed for wounds in battle and all other cases of a ganglionic or epigastric nature. I have no hesitation in saying that these wells are the richest in the world, or any other of which we are informed. A man living in the neighborhood informed me that he has been sick for ninety odd years, and has always used the petroleum oil upon his ailing wheels. Such is the inexhaustible nature of the yield, that an aqueduct might be formed in the vicinity, or an oil canal constructed to float the barrels upon. The oil also yields a variety of excellent perfumes, such as new-mown hay, jockey club, jessamine, westend, etc. It is an invaluable substitute for butter, and has been known to fry eels to a delicious brown before the animals had done wriggling. Its paralytic nature makes it go well with pastry. It makes puddings at sea, and pies on shore.

In addition to this it contains a larger residuum of gold.

The following analysis shows the incredible richness of this oil:

Benzole.....	1
Chloride of Sodium.....	1
Pure Petroleum.....	45
Orange Co. butter.....	11
Hair-oil, in bottles.....	6
Gold coin.....	30
Paraffine candles.....	4
Calves-foot jelly.....	2

parts, 200

Many samples are richer. I possess one which yields two gallons of hair-oil and a pound of butter to the gallon of petroleum. In boring for the oil a fine vein of port-wine was struck. This might be bottled and sent to market. It is supposed to be 300,000 years old, and must be good. There is also a promise of striking a large subterranean mine of sardines. Preserved in oil, these fish must be delicious.

Besides the above advantages, there are not wanting indications of a fertile field of quinine, which, while the war lasts, must bring a large revenue to the company. Quinine baths might be constructed, and the quinine itself conducted to the various government-hospitals by pipes.

I have the honor to be, dear sir, your obedient servant,
OILY GAMMON, Analytical and Consulting Chemist.

The blanks were appropriately filled up by the Secretary, and the Board adjourned.

The next thing was to procure the oil-lands. The Treasurer had an uncle who owned a rock on Oil Creek, but the land on which it stood belonged to another man. On the following day Mr. Wobble generously donated this rock to the Company, but on motion of T. Montague, Esq., it was declined with thanks. The fact is, I thought we could do better, and so I informed the Board.

My idea was for the Board to visit the oil-regions in person, and see what could be done on the spot. Motion carried.

For this purpose I made the following arrangements:

Mr. Skitts and myself were to go on first. When on the cars we were to lose our tickets—ahem!—and telegraph to Robert Prodcraft, Esq., banker, New York, for an endorsement of our pecuniary responsibility. An affirmative answer would probably place us in a position to send for the balance of the Board, to prosecute our enterprise all together, and to raise sufficient funds to repay the railroad company, and return to New York after accomplishing everything successfully.

This being agreed to, we start to-morrow. On my return I shall lay before the public a full and graphic account of the journey.

A CLEAN SELL.—A shrewd countryman was in town the other day, gawky, uncouth, and innocent enough in appearance, but in reality with his eye-teeth cut. Passing up Chatham street, New York through the Jews' quarter he was continually importuned to buy. From almost every store some one rushed out in accordance with the annoying custom of that street to seize upon and try and force him to purchase. At last one dirty-looking fellow caught him by the arm and clamorously urged him to become a customer. "Have you any shirts?" inquired the countryman, with a very innocent look. "A splendid assortment, sir. Step in, sir." Every price and every style. The cheapest in the street, sir. "Are they clean?" "To be sure, sir. Step in, sir." "Then," resumed the countryman, with perfect gravity, "put one on, for you need it." The rage of the shopkeeper may be imagined, as the countryman, turning upon his heel, quietly pursued his way.

A POOR Frenchman being aroused from sleep by his wife with the cry, "Get up, Baptiste, there's a robber in the house," calmly answered, "Don't let us molest him. Let him ransack the house, and if he should find anything of value we'll take it away from him."

FUNIANA.

A POOR woman, who had attended several confirmations, was at length recognized by the Bishop. "Pray, have I not seen you here before?" said his lordship. "Yes," replied the woman, "I get me confirmed as often as I can; they tell me it is good for the rheumatis."

A MAN of sagacity being informed of a serious quarrel between two of his female relations, asked the persons if in their quarrels either had called the other ugly? On receiving an answer in the negative, "O, then, I shall soon make up the quarrel."

LADY —— spoke to the butler to be saving of an excellent cask of small beer, and asked him how it might be best preserved? "I know no method so effectual, my lady," replied the butler, "as placing a barrel of good ale by it."

A MAN unused to law courts hearing a Judge call a serjeant "brother," expressed his surprise. "Oh," said one present, "they are brothers—brothers-in-law."

A NOTFRIOUS miser having heard a very eloquent charity sermon, exclaimed: "This sermon strongly proves the necessity of alms. I have almost a mind to turn beggar."

ONE day Sheridan made his appearance in a pair of new boots; these attracting the notice of some of his friends: "Now guess," said he, "how I came by these boots?" Many probable guesses then took place. "No!" said Sheridan, "no, you've not hit, nor ever will—I bought them, and paid for them!"

A COACHMAN, extolling the sagacity of one of his horses, observed that "if anybody was to go for to use him ill, he would bear malice like a Christian."

Dr. A., physician at Newcastle, being summoned to a vestry, in order to reprimand the sexton for drunkenness, he dwelt so long on the sexton's misconduct as to draw from him this expression: "Sir, I thought you would have been the last man alive to appear against me, as I have covered so many blunders of yours!"

A RICH man sent to call a physician for a slight disorder. The physician felt his pulse, and said: "Do you eat well?" "Yes," said the patient. "Do you sleep well?" "I do." "Then," said the physician, "I shall give you something to take away all that!"

SOME years ago, says Richardson, in his anecdotes of painting, a gentleman came to me to invite me to his house. "I have a picture of Rubens," says he, "and it is a rare good one. Little H. the other day came to see it, and says it is a copy. If any one says so again, I'll break his head! Pray, Mr. Richardson, will you do me the favor to come and give me your real opinion of it?"

A LADY, after performing, with the most brilliant execution, a sonata on the pianoforte, in the presence of Dr. Johnson, turning to the philosopher, took the liberty of asking him if he was fond of music? "No, madam," replied the doctor; "but of all noises, I think music is the least disagreeable."

A YOUNG man met a rival who was somewhat advanced in years, and wishing to annoy him, inquired how old he was? "I can't exactly tell," replied the other; "but I can inform you that an ass is older at twenty than a man at sixty!"

DR. ROBERTSON observed that Johnson's jokes were the rebukes of the righteous, described in Scripture as being like excellent oil. "Yes," exclaimed Burke, oil of vitriol.

A FELLOW on the quay, thinking to quiz a poor Irishman, asked him: "How do the potatoes eat now, Pat?" The Irish lad, who happened to have a shillelah in his hand, answered: "O! they eat very well, my jewel; would you like to taste the stalk?" and knocking the inquirer down, coolly walked off.

A MEDICAL student under examination, being asked the different effects of heat and cold, replied: "Heat expands and cold contracts." "Quite right; can you give me an example?" "Yes, sir, in summer, which is hot, the days are longer; but in winter, which is cold, the days are shorter."

ONE of Sir Boyle Roche's children asked him one day, "Who was the father of George III.?" "My darling," he answered, "it was Frederick, Prince of Wales, who would have been George III. if he had lived."

A YOUTH, after vainly trying to explain some scientific theory to his fair innamorata, said:

"The question is difficult, and I don't see what I can do to make it clearer."

"Suppose you pop it," whispered the blushing damsel.

SHERIDAN inquiring of his son what side of politics he should espouse on his inauguration to St. Stephen's, the son replied that he intended to vote for those who offered best, and that he should wear on his forehead a label, "To let." "I suppose, Tom, you mean to add, 'unfurnished,'" rejoined the father.

THERE is a celebrated reply of Mr. Curran to a remark of Lord Clare, who curtly exclaimed at one of his legal positions: "Oh, if that be law, Mr. Curran, I may burn my law-books!" "Better read them, my lord."

NELSON'S EXTRACT OF Roses and Rosemary.

THE FOLLOWING IS A BRIEF NOTICE of some of its principal virtues, as a mild stimulant, corrective and preservative agent for the hair:

Infancy.—It insinuates its balsamic properties into the pores of the head, nourishes the hair in its embryonic state, accelerates its growth, sustains it in maturity, and continues the possession of healthy vigor, silky softness, and luxuriant redundancy, to the latest period of human life. Genial and purifying, it dispels all scurf and impurity, and renders the use of the fine comb unnecessary.

The Beard, Whiskers, and Mustachios.—Its extraordinary power in promoting the growth of the hair is singularly displayed in creating these ornaments of manhood.

Curl and Embellishment.—In dressing the hair nothing can equal its effect, rendering the hair so admirably soft that it will lie in any direction, producing beautifully flowing curls, and, by the transcendent lustre it imparts, rendering the coiffure inexpressibly attractive.

Grey Hair.—Its nourishing properties are eminently successful in the prevention of Grey Hair, and in numerous instances, in the restoration to its original color.

Baldness.—Its productive powers are constantly and surprisingly shown in cases of Baldness, so that in numerous instances where other specifics have been tried in vain, this celebrated Oil has effected a complete restoration of Beautiful Hair.

Sea-Bathing and Violent Exercise.—After indulging in either of these, so apt to exhaust the nourishing matter secreted at the roots or bulbs of the hair, the Roses and Rosemary will be found most efficacious, both in preserving and in immediately restoring the hair to its usual appearance of health with renovated brightness.

Its invaluable properties have obtained the patronage of every Court of the civilized world; and the high esteem in which it is universally held, together with numerous testimonials constantly received of its efficacy, affords the best and surest proofs of its merits.

LAWRENCE & COMPANY'S

PATENT IMPROVED

Flesh Gloves and Straps!

For Producing a Healthy State of the System by Friction, Without the Risk of Tearing the Skin, as all the Ordinary Horse-Hair Gloves are liable to do.

THE GREAT VALUE OF THE HORSE-HAIR

Renovator as a therapeutic agent, when applied to the human body, is now too well known to every one who has paid the least attention to the importance of a healthy action of the skin, to require further comment.

The superior advantages of the Patent Flesh Gloves and Straps, manufactured under this Patent, are that, by a peculiar process in the machinery employed in their manufacture, the points of the Hair are brought perpendicularly to the surface, thereby removing the liability to tear the skin (a very general complaint against the ordinary kind,) rendering them more pleasant to use, at the same time enabling the process of friction to be much more effectually performed; they are, indeed, a positive luxury to use, apart from their salutary effects.

The peculiar fabric manufactured expressly for the use of Ladies deserves their special attention; it has been highly recommended by the most eminent of the medical profession, and given universal satisfaction to those who have used it.

For sale by H. P. WAKELEE, Cor. Montgomery and Sutter streets. sc24

ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,
ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERNATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

CATARH!

Catarh Remedy!

FOR CENTURIES CATARRH HAS DEFIED THE skill of physicians and surgeons. No medical work contains a prescription that will eradicate it. Nothing save DR. GOODALE'S REMEDY will break it up, radically destroying the principle of the disease, and precluding the possibility of a relapse. Medical men have attempted to explain what it is, but admit that they have not discovered its antidote. Dr. Goodale offers this simple definition of its character: It is a disorder which he DOES CURE and they DO NOT. This is the great fact which it imports the sufferer to know, and a single trial will establish it beyond a question. Price, $1. Sold by all Druggists.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REDUCTION and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES
NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs. in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration, particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

B. A. HENRIKSEN'S

PATENT CHIMNEY TOP.

THIS useful invention is confidently recommended in all cases where it is desirable to create a great draft.

ON STEAMSHIPS

Its use will dispense with the use of the blower and the tall smoke stack, as it causes the furnace to consume the smoke. It has been successfully used on steamers, in San Francisco. The proprietor has permission to refer to Chas. Munro, Esq., as to its value on steamers.

FOUNDRIES AND MACHINE SHOPS,

And all works requiring a great heat will find it of immense benefit. Stephen Culverwell and Lyon & Co., Brewers, are now using it, and to them I refer.

ON SAILING VESSELS

It has been used to great advantage, where, on account of baffling winds, it is difficult to keep fire in the galley.

FOR SMOKY CHIMNEYS

It is a sure cure, and has been used on the Russ House and other first-class buildings in this city.

FOR VENTILATION,

It is unexcelled, and is recommended to architects and owners of buildings where ventilation is required.

FOR MINING PURPOSES

It is well adapted, thoroughly removing all foul air from shafts and tunnels.

The proprietor also refers to the following gentlemen, who have used it: Capt. Lassen, brig Crimea; Dr. Nuttall, Calhoun & Son, Printers; Edgerly & Wickman, Ship Chauldiers; J. B. Quintin, builder; Philip Cadue, Esq.

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS.

ANOTHER week of glorious news for the Union-loving people of California! Victory, the harbinger of a speedy and lasting peace, the sure forerunner of release to our war-stricken country, has again perched upon the banner of the Republic. Nearly every despatch flashed across the continent since the last number of THE CALIFORNIAN went before its readers, has rung "victory" along the wire and tapped it upon the electric bell. An eminent authority once said that the most humane and the most glorious battle ever fought was that one which produced the greatest carnage and gave the most decisive victory. Carnage enough we have had upon the fields of Virginia, Tennessee, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Georgia—wherever a battle has been fought, in fact—but strangely enough the bloodshed was accompanied by no "decisive victory," and very little seemed to be gained towards the final consummation of peace and union. The recent victories of Thomas before Nashville, however, give us grounds for hoping that as these battles were remarkable in magnitude of disaster to the enemy, he will be enabled to follow them up by a succession of triumphs which shall bring about a verification of the philosophy contained in the above quotation. The greater our victories both in magnitude and number, the nearer are we to a permanent peace and a Union which shall be indissoluble.

December 15.—From the Army of the Potomac a rumor comes that a number of pickets watching the rear lines were taken and murdered. Some of the troops engaged in the late raid on the Weldon railroad returned with their hands and feet frozen. Weather severe.

Gen. Davidson, in his late raid from Baton Rouge, burned a non-script camp, destroyed all the stores and dwellings, captured a large number of horses and carried away an immense number of negroes.

The N. Y. Times states that a large fleet, consisting of 64 vessels, including double-turreted Monitor gunboats and ironclads, carrying 567 guns, accompanied by land forces on transports, all under the command of Admiral Porter, left Hampton Roads on the 13th. Their direction was Southward.

From Nashville, Gen. Thomas telegraphs that he engaged the enemy on the 15th, driving him from the river a distance of 8 miles; he captured Chalmers' headquarters and train, a second train of about 20 wagons, 16 pieces of artillery and about 1500 prisoners.

Gen. Canby, in an expedition from Vicksburg, cuts off Hood's communication with Mobile.

The Richmond papers report the capture of Bristol, Tenn., by an expedition under the command of Stoneman and Burbridge. They also acknowledge the loss of many gallant officers and men at the battle of Franklin, among whom are enumerated Maj. Generals B. Johnson, Williams and Granby, killed; Maj. Gen. John Brown, Brig. Gens. Carter, Marrigalt, Quarles, Cockerell, and Scott, wounded.

Gen. Sherman captured Fort McAllister, at the mouth of the Ogeechee river, on the 14th. The following is his official despatch, on reaching the coast with his army:

ON BOARD THE GUNBOAT "DONELSON," }
Ossabaw Sound, Dec. 13—11:50 P. M. }

To-day, at 5 P. M., Gen. Haven's division of the Fifteenth Corps carried Fort McAllister by assault, capturing the entire garrison and stores. This opened to us Ossabaw Sound, and I passed down to this gunboat to communicate with the fleet. Before opening communication we had completely destroyed all the railroads leading into Savannah and invested the city. Our left is on the Savannah river, 10 miles above the city, and right on the Ogeechee, at King's Bridge. The army is in splendid order, the weather fine, and supplies abundant. Our march was most agreeable and we were not molested by guerrillas. We reached Savannah three days ago, but owing to Fort McAllister we could not communicate, but now we have Fort McAllister we can go ahead. We captured two boats on the Savannah river, and prevented their gunboats from coming down. The estimated population of Savannah is 25,000, and the garrison numbers 15,000. Gen. Hardee commands. We have not lost a wagon on the trip, but have gathered a large supply of negroes, mules and horses. Our teams are in better condition than when we started. My first duty will be to clear the army of superfluous negroes, mules and horses. I have literally destroyed over two hundred miles of railroad, and consumed all the stores and provisions that were essential to the armies of Lee and Hood.

Quick work was made with Fort McAllister, and opening communication with our fleet; and the consequent independence for supplies dissipates all their boasted threats to head me off and starve the army. I regard Savannah as already gained.

W. T. SHERMAN, Maj. Gen.

December 16.—On the 16th, Gen. Thomas renews the battle of the previous day, and obtains a complete victory over the rebel forces under Hood, in front of Nashville, capturing 5,000 prisoners, 39 guns, and 7,000 small arms. The day was a bloody one. 7,000 are reported as being placed hors de combat on both sides. The enemy is in retreat with Thomas in full pursuit.

An expedition up the Roanoke discovers that river full of obstructions. Some of the Federal gunboats were blown up by torpedoes.

The expedition toward Bristol, after capturing that place, advanced on Abingdon and took it; then pounced down on Glade Spring Depot, capturing all the railroad employes. This is a raid in Breckinridge's rear.

On the 13th, Burbridge had a fight with Basil Duke's brigade, (formerly John Morgan's) and routed it with loss to the enemy of 156 killed, wounded and prisoners. Their trains were all captured. Dick Morgan, brother of John, is among the prisoners.

December 19.—From the Headquarters of the Department of the Cumberland, near Spring Hill, Gen. Thomas telegraphs, on the 18th, that he is still in pursuit of the fleeing forces of Hood; he takes a few hundred prisoners.

The New York Times' special despatch from Nashville, on the 19th, says: "Thomas is pursuing the enemy to Duck river. We have nearly all of Hood's artillery. All the rivers are high, and bridges in front of Hood are destroyed. We have captured 9,000 prisoners, including 3,000 wounded at Franklin, and four Major Generals. Hood had 65 guns—54 of which we now have. The enemy's killed and wounded are about the same as our own, which will not reach 3,500. Forrest gave Murfreesboro another trial on the 15th, and was repulsed by Rousseau and Milroy. The rebel General Johnston says their loss at Franklin was 5,000, while ours was 1,900. Stoneman has whipped Breckinridge in East Tennessee, near the Virginia line, killing, wounding and capturing a large number, and taking most of his artillery. Gen. Edward McCook is after Lyon in Kentucky, and he cannot escape. Murfreesboro Bridge, Port Stevenson, Chattanooga and Knoxville are all right."

December 21.—Commander Parker, learning that the rebels were massing boats on Coon river for the purpose of making a raid on the Chesapeake Bay, sent two steamers against them and captured thirty-one large boats and two scows, and drove the guard off.

In the rebel House of Representatives, Mullen, of Virginia, offered a resolution in favor of sending Commissioners to treat for peace. Mullen stated that Bishop Day, who recently arrived at Richmond, had been assured by Gen. Grant that any such Commissioners would be allowed to pass through the lines.

Footo has resigned in disgust. He made a farewell speech in which he speaks of matters and things in rebellion as in a deplorable condition, and attributes their failure to Davis' despotism. He says:

"We are upon the verge of ruin. Congress is rapidly abandoning all its important powers and building up an irresponsible despotism, the like of which has never been seen upon earth. The policy of the present House seems to be to crush out dissatisfaction by armed violence alone, in imitation of that thorough policy introduced and enforced in England by the celebrated Earl Stafford, the enforcement of which speedily brought Charles the First to the block, but not before Stafford had lost his own head."

And further on he remarks:

"Presidential interference is the cause of all this dire mischief, no, should Hood's army be destroyed—an event which I fear is but too probable—and Sherman should come round to this vicinity in ships, which I do not doubt he intends, what will be the fate of Richmond?"

The rebel Senate have passed the bill for arming the negroes. For several days past every able-bodied negro has been quietly seized and hurried off to the camps of instruction.

December 22.—A Nashville special despatch of the 21st says that the situation at the front is unchanged. Our army is confident of a total success, and is still pressing forward. Prisoners continue to come in. Gen. Ed. McCook defeated the rebel Gen. Lyons, at Hopkinsville, on the 16th, and captured his artillery. McCook is still pursuing.

A Savannah paper of the 18th says that on Saturday and Sunday artillery firing was kept up actively on both sides.

LOCAL MATTERS OF THE WEEK.

CHRISTMAS and New Year's Days falling on Sunday, this year, by general consent the Monday following will be set apart for holiday celebration.

Grand Pontifical High Mass will be celebrated at St. Mary's Cathedral at 12 o'clock to-night. Over forty distinguished vocal and instrumental performers will render Von Weber's Mass in G. Midnight mass will also be celebrated in the churches of St. Ignatius, St. Patrick, St. Francis and St. Bridget.

The Trinity Mission Sunday School will hold their Christmas Festival at Platt's Hall this evening. The Festival of the Unitarian Church and Sunday School will be held at Platt's Hall on Monday afternoon and evening, the Children's Festival commencing at 2 1/2 P. M.

The ladies of the Minna-street Methodist Church, Rev. O. P. Fitzgerald, Pastor, will hold a festival on Tuesday evening, 27th inst. A supper, music, and various other attractions are presented. A very pleasant Christmas reunion is anticipated, and everybody invited.

It will be recollected that William Brown, a negro, some time ago brought suit against the Omnibus Railroad Company for $10,000 damages, because the driver and conductor put him off a car of the company in pursuance of a regulation prohibiting negroes from riding on their cars. The case was on trial before a jury in the Fourth District Court on Wednesday. Judge Sawyer instructed the jury that if they found from the evidence that plaintiff went on the cars, tendered his fare, and was a "person of good character, orderly, clean, and not infected with any noxious disease," defendants were liable for all damages sustained in consequence of said non-transportation. The company contended that the regulation was necessary, for the reason that the presence of negroes in the cars was injurious to their business. The Judge, however, decided that they had no legal right to make such regulations. The jury, after an absence of two hours, returned a verdict of $3,199.58 for the plaintiff.

As the freight train for San José was proceeding to its destination last Saturday afternoon, having a passenger car attached, one of the freight cars ran off the track at the lofty embankment near the Industrial School. The passenger car broke its coupling and rolled to the bottom of the embankment. Ten or fifteen persons were more or less injured. E. A. Hudson, springing off the train as the first car ran off the track, was caught under the one that rolled down the embankment and crushed to death. The Coroner's inquest failed to show any culpability on the part of the company or neglect of its officers, and we have simply to record it as an unfortunate accident. The deceased was a native of Massachusetts, aged 30 years.

A lady residing on Sixth street was very severely burned, Tuesday evening, by the explosion of a coal-oil lamp which she was carrying in her hand. A great deal of the oil sold as kerosene, in this city, is little better than camphene.

Last Monday Manager Maguire was fined fifty dollars by Judge Shepherd, for a violation of the Sunday Law. The other theatre proprietors who were held under similar charges, entered the plea of guilty to one charge each, the additional cases being dismissed, and they will all be fined the same as Mr. Maguire, fifty dollars each.

The charge of libel against D. O. McCarthy of the Daily American Flag, for publishing divers statements reflecting on Mr. James Nisbet, editor of the Daily Evening Bulletin, which statements the complaining witness characterizes as "malicious, slanderous and defamatory," was brought up last Monday in the Police Court for examination. The defendant objected to the complaint on the ground of its combining a multiplicity of causes of action. Judge Shepherd sustained the objection, and allowed the prosecution to elect upon which charge they would proceed. The case was set for hearing on Monday next. A civil suit, also, is pending in the Twelfth District Court, for $10,000 damages against the same defendant, in which R. F. Ryan is plaintiff.

On Monday last, Lewis Mahoney, a noted character in the annals of crime in this State, was arrested on two charges of grand larceny. Mahoney is well known to old residents as one of the most desperate outlaws that ever escaped the gallows.

On Monday morning about 4 o'clock, Conrad Becker, a German, residing on Broadway, between Stockton and Dupont streets, committed suicide by cutting his throat with a razor. His wife was absent on country, but his two children were asleep in the bed from which he had just risen when he committed the act. He seated himself on a chest near the bed and cut his throat, but afterwards staggered to the bed, took the children out, throw himself upon it and expired.

An attempt was made to fire the building occupied by the Mercantile Library Association, Wednesday night, but was fortunately discovered in time to prevent any serious damage.

THOS. REYNOLDS, by permission of Gov. Low, returned to the city on Friday of last week, from San Quentin, where he had been sojourning since 1860, under a penalty of five years' imprisonment for burglary. His exemplary conduct within the walls of the prison induced the Governor to let him out. Arriving in this city on the 16th, he immediately resumed the practice of his profession, and the morning of the 17th found him corraled in the station-house on a charge of larceny. Mr. Reynolds' stay with us will probably be brief.

About three o'clock Wednesday afternoon, Henry Shrom shot his wife twice with a revolver, afterwards killing himself by discharging the pistol in his mouth. The circumstances are briefly as follows: On Tuesday, Mrs. Ellen Shrom, who is only about sixteen years old, having been married to Henry Shrom about a year and six months, made a complaint against her husband for maltreating and threatening to shoot her. He was arrested and taken to the station-house. She afterwards relented, and went to the prison to procure his release. In this she failed; and he was examined Wednesday morning, his wife Ellen appearing to testify against him. He was convicted of an assault and battery, and ordered to appear for sentence Thursday morning. After the trial in the Police Court, she started to go to her mother's, on or near Centre street, east of Folsom. Arriving at Centre street, they walked together for some distance, Shrom quarrelling with his wife on the way. He told her that she would never talk so brave against him again in Court; that she should never draw another breath, and at the same time drew a six-shooter, and fired twice at her in quick succession. The first ball entered the woman's right side, between the fifth and sixth ribs; the second one taking effect behind the right ear, at the base of the head. On receiving the second shot, Mrs. Shrom fell to the earth. Shrom then put the muzzle of the pistol in his mouth, and fired, producing almost instant death. He fell in the street, whence his body was conveyed to the dead-house on Sacramento street. Mrs. Shrom was taken to the County Hospital, suffering intensely from her wounds. Shrom has been jealous of his wife; and although his mother-in-law says that "he was a very fine man," and devotedly attached to her, his jealousy caused them to live together very unhappily.

The prize-fight between Patsy Marley and Johnny Devine, which had been publicly advertised for some days previous, came off Thursday evening the parties pummeling each other for three hours. No effort was made to prevent it by the authorities. On the 142d round, Marley gave a "foul" blow, and Devine claims the fight.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FIFTEENTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, in and for the County of San Francisco.

HENRY TOOMY, Plaintiff, vs. JAMES H. RAY, Defendant.—Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES H. RAY, Defendant. —You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of the service,) after the Service on you of this Summons —if served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise, within Forty Days—on judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to recover in U. S. gold coin, the sum of $946, alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff upon a certain promissory note, and upon an account stated, as set forth and alleged, in plaintiff's complaint, with interest on said sum of $946, at the rate of two per cent. per month, from May 25th, 1864, and costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will take judgment against you, payable in U. S. gold coin for said sum of $946, and interest as aforesaid and costs.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 19th day of December, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

WET AND DRY.—What a great propensity people have for imbibing "something" in rainy weather! How can one account for the paradoxical fact that the wetter they get the drier they are? HOW ENGLISH WOMEN ARE MADE UP.

[The London correspondent of the Boston Saturday Gazette, in a late letter, reveals the secret of the English feminine toilet, thus:]

A RECENT number of an able review contains an article on the present rage for cosmetics amongst women of the higher classes; it says: "There are a good many very respectable women who would prefer to hear that some scandalous story was being circulated about them rather than to have it popularly believed that they painted. It is very likely that this feeling will not last. An under-current of feeling seems to be setting in upon this momentous subject, but it has only got as far as people's actions and has not yet affected the sentiments they profess in conversation. Any one judging of the manners and customs of the women of England merely from what he hears them say, would imagine that paint was an utter abomination; but there are painful indications that the forbidding thing is not quite so strange to them as they would have people believe. Any one who is curious on these subjects should study the price-lists of some of the fashionable perfumers. They contain a mass of information concerning what a German would call the genesis of female beauty. It has become quite an art in the ingenuity and elaboration of its detail, and, if we may judge by its results, a very successful one. To the poet or the sentimentalist it might be pleasanter to believe that the beautiful and delicate coloring that may be seen in any large gathering of English women was Nature's spontaneous product. But perhaps it is more congenial to our own ingenuity and skill." Then follows an enumeration of the articles used for making up the requisite complexion of the English beauty. But the writer should have pursued the subject further and brought forward the celebrated Rachel, who boasts of having fifteen hundred noble ladies between the ages of twenty-five and seventy under her care, who, by means of her Circassian bath, are rejuvenated and to all appearances are in the first bloom of youth.

This remarkable woman calls herself an artist. The visitor on entering her studio is shown several beautiful models and asked which she desires to resemble. If a brunette has a fancy to be changed to a blonde, she is assured that the transition is quite possible. The hair, through the secret and marvellous properties of a gold hair wash, is turned from any shade of brown or black by gradual process to a bright sunny yellow. The skin is bleached to dazzling whiteness and every wrinkle removed by means of the Circassian bath; a faint bloom tints the cheeks, and the eyes, although unchanged in color, are enlarged and made brilliant by a process warranted neither unpleasant nor dangerous. A blonde is metamorphosed to a brunette in a manner equally satisfactory.

Mme. Rachel effects these marvellous changes by means of washes. She has nothing to do with enamelling, which she terms a disgusting cheat that deceives no one, however shortsighted. She assures her patients that their faces may be examined with a glass and yet not a trace of the means employed for their beautification will be visible. She avows herself to be a daughter of Israel and pretends that certain secrets regarding the embellishing of women, known in the days of old, mentioned in the book of Esther, have been preserved in her family and transmitted to her as a precious heirloom. Mme. Rachel offers youth and beauty in exchange for gold. She is well known and much visited by fashionable women in London; her prices are beyond the reach of people in the middle ranks of life. But if the truth must be told, these marvellous washes require to be constantly renewed, for after the magical transformation which follows the first bath a reaction takes place, and a woman that goes to bed lovely as the new-created Eve may awake in the morning to find her glass reflecting a discolored, disfigured, pitiful object, whose only hope is in the second bath that restores both youth and beauty.

How long the renewing process may continue to prove effectual is known only to Mme. Rachel and her patients, who doubtless will keep their own secrets. It has always been supposed that certain kinds of fraud and corruption were known only in France; but experience proves that whatsoever is evil and of ill repute may be found in England.

WOMAN'S WORTH.—Worth, the woman's tailor, has returned to town and commenced his season. Do not wonder if I mention him next after divorcees, he has caused more divorces than any other man in Paris; for if your wife's ball dress is not made and put on by him, she is disgraced, and if he does not make them, you are ruined. Is it his fault that his rates of charging are so high? Make the days forty-eight hours long and relieve him of the vulgar wants of sleeping and eating, he will abate 50 per cent. of his prices. Seduce his customers into paying cash and he will make a further reduction. The Empress has owed him $40,000. The Princess Clotilde, $10,000. The Princess de Metternich, $20,000. A debt of $1000 makes no more figure on his books than the one year's subscription of a delinquent patron of your paper does in the Gazette office. I should not like to say what rent he pays—you would be sure to make an ironical gesture not very complimentary to my regard for truth. The state saloons of the Tuileries are not more splendid. Gilding is lavished on them, the door curtains are Beauvais tapestry, the window curtains and furniture are of the finest Lyons brocade, and the furniture is Bonle, each console between the windows being worth $600. He has in one of his many rooms a buffet constantly spread where the best sandwiches, the choicest sherry and Maderia, and the most delicate cakes are served in profusion to his customers. He is constantly surrounded by twelve beautiful young girls selected for the perfection of their shape as well as face. They are attired in the height of the mode in silk dresses which cost four dollars a yard, costly Etruscan ear-rings, bracelets and rings. They are part of the furniture of the place; they are here what osier mannikins are in inferior shops; the dresses are hung on them that Worth's patrons may see the effect produced. No dress ever quits his establishment priced less than $200—in gold, mind ye? we don't take your greenbacks here! Whenever a ball is given at the Tuileries or at any of the embassies you may count two hundred carriages at his door from as early as six o'clock in the evening. Each lady receives a number and is called in turn. They come with their hair dressed, their petticoats and corset on wrapped in a second rate dress until he is ready to dress them. You may wonder that ladies should consent to expose their persons to the fingers and eyes of a man. He is not a man in their eyes—he is nothing but a tailor, a tradesman—and what high born person ever stooped to inquire to what sex such a plebeian belonged. One had as soon think of inquiring into the sex of the dog with whom his wife went into the woods for a walk or of the cat who sleeps in my lady's chamber. Worth, a few years since, was a mere shopman in Gangerlin's shop in the Rue de Richelieu. He saw there the extent of feminine folly and determined to profit by experience. He has now a beautiful country seat which cost him $80,000, and on which he has spent $50,000. He keeps a carriage and pair equal to anything in the imperial stables. He has a first-rate cook, has a cellar which is daily improving, and is making money as fast as possible.—"Spiridion's" Paris Letter.

MAJESTY AND MUSIC.—A Paris correspondent furnishes the following account of an interview between two talented "players": The Emperor is standing at the open window, engaged in an animated conversation with a gentleman whom all Europe knows. For where is the man who has not once in his life seen and heard Franz Liszt? At this moment, however, it was only the politician who was talking with Napoleon; the turn of the pianoforte player came afterward. Liszt was speaking of his native land, Hungary, with the same enthusiasm as he sings his national songs. Everything he said to the Emperor did not reach me, although, thanks to my acquaintance with several of the aides-de-camp, I had found my way into the ante-chamber, and boldly seated myself at a table, on which piles of newspapers, books, and engravings lay. In short, the Emperor laughed quietly in his black mustache, as he always does when he will not answer but feels pleased with the person he is conversing with. Many-tongued fame, which knows everything, reports that the Emperor exclaimed: "Quand je pense à tout ce qui s'est de ja accompli pendant mon regne, je pense avoir cent ans." Liszt is said to have answered: "Sire, vous les avez, car vous êtes le siècle." The happy bon mot of the liberal Magyar bore rapid and brilliant fruit, for on the very next morning there appeared an imperial decree in the Moniteur nominating the great musician (and payer of compliments) a Commander of the Legion of Honor.

A WORTHY BLACKSMITH.—A Paris correspondent thus describes an odd scene which he says took place at a theatre in the environs of Lyons: A worthy blacksmith occupied the first seat in the pit, and seemed to be absorbed by the incidents of the drama until the leading juvenile made his appearance, whereupon the excellent spectator leaped upon the stage and gave the "leading juvenile" a sound thrashing, which the latter bore with exemplary resignation. The police rushed forward and soon obtained the explanation of the strange proceeding. The blacksmith told him that he, the "leading juvenile," was his son, whom he believed to be at Paris pursuing his studies, and who drew regularly every month on him for his board, tuition fees and book bill. He excused himself for his impetuosity, but confessed that he could not command himself. The blacksmith agreed to allow the proceedings to continue, and he resumed his seat; but when he shook his fist at the "leading juvenile," and called him blackguard, rogue, knave, whenever he appeared, the laughter in the house destroyed all the effect of the drama. After the curtain fell he collared the "leading juvenile" and carried him home.

RISTORI, THE TRAGEDIENNE.—During the last voyage of the steamer Moris, from Marseilles to Alexandria, she took on board, at Messina, Madame Ristori and her Italian company of performers. During the passage, Captain Terriggi, the commander, requested the eminent tragedienne to give a representation on board, for the benefit of the sufferers by the fire, at Limoges. Madame Ristori and her company readily consented, and the performance realized a sum of 2,100 francs, which the captain on his return remitted to Limoges.

ALEXANDRA TOO SIMPLE TO BE A QUEEN.—Who can CUT HER OUT?—The English correspondent of the Independence Belge thus refers to the growing unpopularity of young Alexandra, whose charms have vanished with the birth of her baby: "The Princess Alexandra, gossip reports, is of an extremely cold and indifferent nature, without enthusiasm, and apparently having no interest in the persons surrounding her or events making up her daily life. She has changed very much in appearance since her marriage, and many who then thought her beautiful now find her quite destitute of charms. As a consequence, all the virtuous mothers and daughters of England lavish their smiles on the Prince. Who knows, they say, which of us may obtain an influence certainly not at present exercised by the poor little Princess of Denmark."

A CURIOUS case is going on in the Parisian courts. An actress has entered suit against one of her colleagues, at one of the small theatres of Paris, for stealing her gestures and intonations.

CURIOUS CALCULATIONS.—The simple interest of one cent, at six per cent. per annum, from the commencement of the Christian era to the close of the year 1863, would be but the trifling sum of eleven dollars, seventeen cents and eight mills; but if the same principal, at the same rate and time, had been allowed to accumulate at compound interest, it would require the enormous sum of 84,840,000,000,000 globes of solid gold, each equal to the earth in magnitude, to pay the interest; and if the sum were equally divided among the inhabitants of the earth, now estimated to be 1,000,000,000, every man, woman and child would receive 84,340 worlds for an inheritance.

Were all these globes placed side by side in a direct line, it would take lightning itself, that can girdle the earth in the wink of an eye, 73,000 years to travel from end to end. And if a Parrott gun were discharged at one extremity while a man was stationed at the other—light travelling 192,000 miles in a second; the initial velocity of a cannon ball being about 1,500 miles per second, and in this case supposed to continue at the same rate; and sound moving through the atmosphere 1,120 feet in a second, he would see the flash after waiting 110,000 years; the ball would reach him in 74,000,000,000 of years; but he would not hear the report of it till the end of 1,000,000,000 centuries. Again, if all these masses of gold were fused into one prodigious ball, having the sun for its centre, it would reach out into space, in all directions, 1,730,000,000 miles, almost reaching the orbit of Herschel or Uranus; and if the interest were continued till the end of the present century, it would entirely fill up the solar system, and even encroach 500,000,000 miles on the domain of the void beyond the planet Neptune, whose orbit, at the distance of 2,850,000,000 miles from the sun, encircles our whole system of worlds.

ARABY'S BALM.—The Arabs possess a wise practice in proceedings for divorce. When married people seek a separation the Cadi orders them to live for some time with a discreet and austere man of the tribe, that the latter may examine their life and see on which side blame lies. This elderly man makes a report at the expiration of the appointed time, and this report is the foundation on which the Cadi builds his judgment of divorce. Experience has demonstrated that there is no better method of restoring peace in families. The husband and wife put thus upon their good behavior resume the manners of courting days. Each strives to be more amiable than the other to convince the "elder of Israel" that it is not this one's fault if the honeymoon changed its quarter. Old loves awakened and the pair that went to the approved man's tent snarling like cat-and-dog return home cooing like doves.

A LONDON paper says that novelists are sometimes sorely put to their wits' end for Christian and surnames which shall in a measure be representative of their characters. A French writer, who had once given pain to a worthy tradesman, coined two outrageous names for certain individuals described in his work, trusting that this time no living being would find himself or herself aggrieved by what he had done. But he was disappointed. A week after his work appeared, letters reached him, begging that the names might be altered, for they happened to be borne by people who described themselves as among the most exemplary and sensitive of his readers. In despair the author is said to have thrown into his hat the letters of the alphabet, taking the first eight as the name of his new hero, and the next seven which came to hand as that of his heroine.

A SINGULAR rumor is afloat among the Chinese at Peking, which shows how prompt they still are to believe ill of foreigners. It is said that the student interpreters were in the habit of kidnapping boys and girls and digging out their eyes to use them for photographic purposes. The Chinese government took the matter up, bamboozed severely several persons who were found propagating the scandal, and have succeeded in arresting four or five of the real kidnappers, so the tale is now beginning to die out.

THE BACHELOR'S DREAM EXPLAINED.I think you remember that some months ago,
I was courting a handsome young girl;
Since then I went travelling up country, you know,
And I've now lost the run of my Belle.I loved her so dearly—I do love her yet,
Of course she must know very well;
Indeed, I am ready to go in a fit
Since I've lost the run of my Belle.I've made an inquiry of all the young chaps—
Been searching at every hotel;
I've now and then called on old Schindam Schnapps
Since I've lost the run of my Belle.Kest running all day like a fool in the street,
To search for another young girl;
And every fine lady I chance for to meet,
I've inquired for my old lover, Belle.I start for a Photographic Gallery,
To look for my sweet little Belle;
And who in the name you think I should see?
A face of that very same girl!I then said, "Dear Belle, I've caught you at last;
Are you lying, or here in disguise?"
And what do you think, my friends, it was?
A picture of her in life size.Now to be seen at H. BUSH'S Gallery, corner of Post,

Lavender has always maintained the highest rank as a perfume in England, but owing to the inferior qualities
usually imported, has almost fallen into disuse in the Uni-

the most delicate and refreshing perfume in use. This preparation is recommended as the pure essence of Garden
Lavender Flowers. sc24GREAT TRIUMPH!!*STEINWAY & SONSWere awarded the FIRST PRIZE MEDAL at the late great

BURDELL'S*Oriental Tooth Wash.*SOUND AND WHITE TEETHAre indispensable to Personal Attraction, and to Health and Longevity, by proper mastication of the food.THIS UNIQUE PREPARATION IS OF INESTIMABLE value in preserving and beautifying the Teeth, strengthening the Gums and in imparting a delicate fragrance to the breath. It eradicates tartar from the Teeth, removes spots of incipient decay, and polishes and preserves the enamel, to which it imparts a PEARL-LIKE WHITENESS.
Its anti-septic and anti-scorbutic properties exercises a highly beneficial and salutary influence; they arrest the further progress of the decay of Teeth, induce a healthy action of the Gums, and cause them to assume the brightness and color indicative of perfect soundness; while, by confirming their adhesion to the Teeth, they give unlimited enjoyment and fresh zest to appetite, by perpetuating effective and complete mastication. It speedily removes those ravages which children sustain in the teeth, owing to the improper use of sweet and acid substances.

CURE YOUR COLD!
SAVE YOUR LUNGS!
NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP
HAS CURED THOUSANDS!
IT WILL CURE YOU!

"A Cough is generally the effect of a cold which has either been improperly treated or entirely neglected. When it proves obstinate, there is always reason to fear the consequences, as this shows a weak state of the lungs, and is often the forerunner of consumption."—Buckan's Domestic Medicine.

STOP THAT COUGHING!

Some of you can't, and we pity you. You have tried every remedy but the one destined by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure; but

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP!

Is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by its surprising curative powers.

WHAT KILLED HIM?

Dr. Hall, in his Journal of Health, speaking of the death of Washington Irving, asks the above question, and adds: "He might well have remained with us for some years to come had it not been for advice, kindly intended, no doubt, but given in thoughtlessness and reckless ignorance.

HE HAD A COLD!

Which, by some injudicious prescription, had been converted into Asthma." Let me say to Dr. Hall, that "prescription" was not

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP.

Keep it in the house—use it freely—give it to your children upon the slightest indication of a cold, and you will think and speak of it as all do who have become acquainted with its merits.

A THING OF BEAUTY
 IS A JOY FOR EVER!

And the choicest attribute of beauty is a fine complexion. Oriental travellers note with rapture

THE DAZZLING BEAUTY

of complexion possessed by the Persian Ladies, and state that it is due solely to the use of a toilet preparation in great repute among them. The secret of this preparation has always been zealously guarded, but, by a singular chance, came into the possession of Mr. W. B. Champlin, who now offers it to the public under the name of and invites attention to its rare merits.

IT WILL NOT INJURE THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL softens the roughest skin. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes all blemishes. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes tan and freckles. THE FIREMEN'S BALL.

DEAR LAURA.—I knew that you were at the Cosmopolitan the other evening, while I was not, being prevented from going by several reasons, the principal one being the fact that I was not expected, for I suppose if the givers of the entertainment had expected me they would have sent me an invitation. Well, after all I'm even with you, as I was at the Firemen's Ball on Thursday evening and you were not—though your absence was probably not owing to the lack of an invitation, as firemen are not proud, and asked even the Cosmopolitan people to their entertainment though these gentlemen didn't ask the Fire Department to theirs. I am sure that the Firemen in their red shirts would have looked a great deal prettier and infinitely more stylish than small fellows with small legs in small clothes, and Marquises and Dukes and Hussars in borrowed ous.

Union Hall never looked better and brighter than it did on Thursday evening; such an improvement on the stupid political meetings that they used to hold there, you cannot imagine. Arches were ranged around the room, and these were festooned with wreaths of evergreen and chaplets of flowers; the flag that everybody wants to die under but doesn't want to go to war to do it, hung everywhere, and canary birds in countless cages vied with the band, but they couldn't beat the fiddles and trombones and big bugles and things. for the music was splendid. A fireman named Charlie Schultz led the band, and I was surprised to see how well he did it, for they say he's foreman of a hooker and lad company, and I thought they only played on trumpets—though the man with the "butt" "plays" on the fire.

Will you believe it, Gen. McD—ll was at the Ball? Do you know I'm beginning to like the General very well, for all that I thought him a little pompous at first. It is real good of him to go out on these occasions, instead of being stuck-up because he wears soldier clothes, and he is just as pleasant and affable as he can be; and if his coming hadn't been the occasion of Gen. Wright's going I should like him first rate, but the old General was a great favorite of mine, you know.

Col. D—m was at the Ball; he doesn't dance a great deal, but he is fond of promenading, and I saw him and a number of friends footing it from one end of the hall to the committee rooms quite often during the evening. I like the Colonel; he always stands up so straight, and is so courteous to ladies, and he doesn't put on airs as some young officers do, and—well, notwithstanding his name, I think it would be hard to beat him.

How shall I tell you of all the pretty fellows I saw there without having to pay extra postage on my letter? You know Major H—y; he is always a manager or director of something, and just as pleasant and polite as a man can be. He is a good partner, too; in fact, when you see me dancing with a man twice you may be sure he is, for I never repeat mistakes. Wm. M. L—t was there. I declare I should like to borrow him from his wife for a week or two, for he's always full of fun—but then she's such a charming lady that I'm afraid he wouldn't stay lent. He isn't very young, you know, though he says he's only a forty-niner; but his heels haven't grown old if his head has—everybody says he has an "old head" on his shoulders.

Billy W—n is a tolerably pretty fellow, but I don't believe he's "the prettiest fellow in town," though Mrs. P. says he is. You ought to have seen him last evening; he flourished around like a green bay horse, or a tree, or a park, or something else of the kind; but he has a great habit of slipping away from his partners into private committee-rooms. I suppose he goes in to wipe his moustache, for he always comes out wiping it. He is good company, for he's seldom sober—by sober, I mean solemn and stupid, you know. Charlie F—n was with him a good deal last evening, and I'm afraid he had a headache this morning to pay for it.

There were lots of people from Washoe there. Do you know Mr. A. McC—y? they tell me he has laid up stores this side of the grave, if he has not beyond. If he is worth half as much as people say he is, he must be a worthy man, and I think I'd marry him if he asked me—I'm old enough to be smart about such things, you know. Then there was Mr. D—sh—r; now he is a handsome fellow, but I'm afraid he doesn't mean to be mine though he has a deal to do with mines. He is a sad flirt, and people tell naughty stories about him. Mr. Henry W—s, isn't a Washoe man, but he's a flirt, too, and it is shameful in a married man, and I'll tell his wife about him some day.

Mr. Lewis L—d and Mr. Jerome L—d were there, looking like twins, as they are. I know it was a pleasant evening, for Lewis made the remark to me several times, and what else do you think he said? He and I were talking together with three or four other girls, and he suddenly stopped short and put his hand on my shoulder—didn't mean any harm by it though—and said: "Suppose, gentlemen, we all go down and take a little drink!" They tell me he is noted for making that remark when in company with his gentlemen friends, and he'd been in company with them a few minutes before, and probably forgot. Jerome is not quite as good looking as Lewis, and the only reason is because he doesn't curl his hair. He promises, though, to put up his hair in papers next time.

I noticed lots of club-men. Charles S—th had on some very nice clothes and looked happy—probably because he is virtuous. Mr. F. McC—y danced with me two or three times, and told me who Bella Donna was, on condition that I wouldn't tell Mr. S—th. Perhaps I'll tell you though, in my next letter. Do you know Asa N—d? I don't, but a friend pointed him out to me and told me that he stood ace high. I don't exactly know whether he meant that he was a good fellow or that he got "high" sometimes—perhaps he meant both. John H—nn—g seemed to have a good deal of fun, talking to all the pretty and clever women in the room. Of course he talked to me, but I mention him last in this way because he didn't ask me to his fancy ball last week—I never before in my life was anxious to be considered one of the fancy. I haven't said anything at all about Charlie LeG—y, though he's a gay fellow, because he carried away my shawl and didn't bring it back to me.

Now if you expect that I am going to tell you what ladies were there and what they wore, you'll be disappointed. For in the first place I haven't time, in the next place I didn't know many of them, and last of all I notice gentlemen a great deal more than I do ladies. Mrs. S—t (who is clever enough to be a senator herself) was there, and I particularly noticed the two misses H—g from their exceedingly tasteful dresses, one wearing blue delightfully trimmed and the other a charmingly colored silk. The most costly dress in the room was worn by Miss R—s (I think that is her name) it had a deep trimming of real lace and could not have cost less than five hundred dollars. Mrs. P—r wore white moire antique, looked well, was in her usual excellent spirits, and seemed to have a right jolly time, though I do think she flirted too much with Mr. William M. L—t. He's a formidable fellow, that William M. L—t is; not altogether because he "pretties much" but because he's got such winning ways. Mrs. O—ns—d, with her bright, happy face and beautiful complexion looked as pretty as a pink, and was becomingly and tastefully dressed in white satin trimmed with black lace; she was dancing all the while, and I know she tired out two or three weak kneed young men, because they told me so.

Now I've done. What more can I say except to add that the supper was splendid; there wasn't much wine—"Oh no!" Eloise, who is looking over my shoulder, remarks "they never have any wine at Firemen's balls!" The effect of the affair was much heightened by the "Firemen's Galop," in which a clanging bell is introduced at intervals, making as much music and noise as a "Fire in the Eighth." The best order prevailed; probably because Lynch law was the order of the evening—to understand that joke you must know that it is the name of the gentlemanly Secretary of the Department—and everybody went home well pleased at a very early hour in the morning; in that everybody is included, dear Laura.

Your own pet,

MATILDA.

(For the Californian.)

THE OLD NEW-YEARS.

WHERE are the old "New-Years,"
With crowds of peach-cheeked children at their plays?
Where are the toddling dears,
Showing a thousand pretty little ways?

Where are the wondrous toys—
The birds that fly and sing, the steeds that prance?
And where the bashful boys
That led the shy young maidens to the dance?

Where are the men of snow?
The castles built of frost upon the glass?
And where the heart's strong glow,
That made the days like golden moments pass?

For sometimes in young ears
So sweet a tale the merry seasons tell,
They heed not passing years,
Save by the New Year chimes—the Old Year's knell.

Each New-Year holiday
Along Life's highway like a mile-post stands,
To mark the measured way,
And point the different roads with silent hands.

Is there not in the Past
Some year though old that seems forever new,
Whose garlands fadeless last,
From whose best blooms Time never shook the dew

Some warm and bright fireside,
Where loving friends with welcome kind and sweet,
Though long, long years divide,
Still by the hearth-stone keep our pleasant seat?

For as a distant shore
O'er waveless leagues a little way appears,
We see them as of yore
Forgetting all the intervening years.

Their fires are blazing still—
Still by the window blooms the rose as bright;
Impassioned voices thrill
With tender songs and laughter and delight.

We leave them at the gate;
No grief can pale those blushing cheeks we press—
No change make desolate
These warm hearts that o'erflow with tenderness.

They never will grow cold,
Nor, lost in other friendships, pass us by;
They never will grow old—
Though many years may pass they never die.

And though no more shall throb
The exultant life as at its morning start,
No year can ever rob
The glorious picture-gallery of the Heart.

EMILIE LAWSON

THE DEATH OF THE OLD YEAR.

Full knee-deep lies the winter snow,
And the winter winds are wearily sighing:
Toll ye the church-bell sad and slow,
And tread softly and speak low,
For the old year lies a-dying.
Old year, you must not die;
You came to us so readily,
You lived with us so steadily,
Old year, you shall not die.

He lieth still: he doth not move:
He will not see the dawn of day.
He hath no other life above.
He gave me a friend, and a true, true-love
And the New-year will take 'em away.
Old year, you must not go:
So long as you have been with us,
Such joy as you have seen with us,
Old year, you shall not go.

He frothed his bumpers to the brim;
A jollier year we shall not see.
But though his eyes are waxing dim,
And though his foes speak ill of him,
He was a friend to me.
Old year, you shall not die;
We did so laugh and cry with you,
I've half a mind to die with you,
Old year, if you must die.

He was full of joke and jest,
But all his merry quips are o'er.
To see him die, across the waste
His son and heir doth ride post-haste,
But he'll be dead before.
Every one for his own.
The night is starry and cold, my friend,
And the New-year, blithe and bold, my friend
Comes up to take his own.

How hard he breathes! over the snow
I heard just now the crowing cock.
The shadows flicker to and fro:
The cricket chirps: the light burns low:
'Tis nearly twelve o'clock.
Shake hands, before you die.
Old year, we'll dearly rue for you:
What is it we can do for you?
Speak out before you die.

His face is growing sharp and thin.
Alack! our friend is gone.
Close up his eyes: tie up his chin:
Step from the corpse, and let him in
That standeth there alone,
And waiteth at the door.
There's a new foot on the floor, my friend,
And a new face at the door, my friend,
A new face at the door.—[Tennyson.]

A HAPPY NEW YEAR—HAPPINESS.

SIR JOHN SINCLAIR, visiting Lord Melville at Wimbledon on the last day of the year 1795, remained all night, and next morning entered his host's room at an early hour to wish him a happy New Year. Melville, who had been reading a long paper on the importance of conquering the Cape of Good Hope, as an additional security to our Indian possessions, said, as he received the shake of his friend's hand: "I hope this year will be happier than the last, for I scarcely recollect having spent one happy day in the whole of it." "This confession, coming from an individual whose whole life hitherto had been a series of triumphs, and who appeared to stand secure upon the summit of political ambition, was often dwelt upon by my father, as exemplifying the vanity of human wishes."—Memoirs of Sir John Sinclair, by his Son.

This anecdote recalls one which Gibbon extracts from the pages of Cardonne. He states that in the Closet of the Ka-liph Abdalrahman the following confession was found after his decease: "I have now reigned fifty years in victory or peace; beloved by my subjects, dreaded by my enemies, and respected by my allies. Riches and honors, power and pleasure, have waited on my call, nor does any earthly blessing appear to have been wanting to my felicity. In this situation I have numbered the days of pure and genuine happiness which have fallen to my lot; they amount to fourteen. O man! place not thy confidence in this present world!"—Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire.

An actual millionaire of our time, a respected member of Parliament on the liberal side, conversing confidently some years ago with a popular authoress, stated that he had once been a clerk in Liverpool, with forty pounds a year, living in a house of four small apartments; and he was fully of the belief that he enjoyed greater happiness then than he has since done in what must appear to the outer world as the most superbly fortunate and luxurious circumstances.

Much has been said, first and last, by sages, preachers and poets, about happiness and its unattainableness here below; but, after all, there remains something to be done—a summing up for the jury, as it were. God certainly has not arranged that any such highly intelligent being as man should be perfectly happy; we have so many facilities to be exercised, so many desires and tastes calling for their several gratifications, and so many and so critical are the circumstances of relation in which these stand towards the outer world, that such a state never can be fully attained. But that approaches may be made to happiness, that by certain conduct we may secure many innocent gratifications, and avoid many painful experiences, is just as true. A harmonious exercise of the faculties in subjection to conscientiousness and benevolence—something to be always working at, something to be always hoping for—under the guidance of reason, so as to avoid over-carefulness on the one hand and over sanguineness on the other—these, attended by a regard to the preservation of that health of body on which health of mind so much depends, will assuredly bring us as near to happiness as Providence, for the keeping of us in activity, has intended we should ever go: and that is all but up to the ideal point. Where, after an active life, the apparently successful man proclaims his having altogether failed to secure happiness, we may be very sure there has been some strange inconsistency in his expectations, some undue straining in a wrong direction, some want of stimulus to the needful activity, some pervading jar between him and his life relations, or that he has been tempted into acts and positions which leave a sting in the mind.—Book of Days.

THE LOCK OF HAIR.

AS a midshipman, I held a sort of neutral position; I was expected to keep myself far above the sailors, but at the same time it was a crime less than mutiny to consider that I was either here or hereafter at less than an unapproachable distance from the sixth mate. It was while I held this unenviable appointment that I first fell in love. Among the passengers on board the ship were two companions and several extra officers of his Majesty's 120th regiment of foot. We were conveying them to Bombay, where they were to be stationed. The wives and daughters of many of the officers were also cabin passengers. The young lady who particularly attracted my attention was the daughter of Major C., a kind-hearted, gentlemanly man, but whose position was of course so superior to that of the unfortunate East India Company's midshipman, that anything in the shape of acquaintanceship or even of conversation was impossible.

Maria, his daughter, was an exceedingly pretty girl about sixteen or seventeen years of age. She was evidently, from the expression of her countenance—for I never but once had the pleasure of speaking to her—exceedingly amiable. It was perfect happiness to me to see her on deck. I used to watch her every afternoon with her mother and sister when the band was playing; and I sincerely envied the military officers who fluttered around her, and I was often severely rated by my superior officers for my inattention to orders.

At last I felt certain that she noticed me, but most probably only from the fact of my incessant gazing at her. She evidently mentioned my behavior to her sister, for she used to regard me with a peculiarly inquisitive sarcastic manner. I hardly think she mentioned my behavior to her mother, at least I never had any reason, from that lady's conduct, to imagine that she was even aware of my existence.

My affection increased to such an extent that at last I grew desperate, and I determined, cost what it might, notwithstanding our fearful difference in position, to make known to her my passion; but how to manage it was the difficulty. To address her personally on the subject was of course impossible. Her mother was a cross-grained, ill-tempered woman, who, when not prostrated by sea-sickness, which, unfortunately, rarely occurred, had her eyes incessantly fixed upon her daughters. I had too much dread of her to think of touching the subject to her, even if my position would not have made such an action presumptuous.

There was only one member of her family with whom there existed the slightest possibility of forming an intimacy, and that was her young brother, a boy about eleven years of age. I immediately broke ground with him, and succeeded admirably. I commenced by giving him a pressing invitation to the midshipman's berth. By degrees our acquaintance ripened into intimacy. Then, after binding him over to eternal secrecy, I confided to him my unhappy, consuming passion for his sister.

Young as he was, and inexperienced in such matters, he kindly sympathized with me. He promised to assist me in every manner that lay in his power. I advised him to begin by pointing me out to his sister and telling her how vastly superior I was to the other midshipmen. Then to hint gently to her how incessantly I was talking and thinking of her. This I considered would be as much as would be prudent at the commencement.

In a short time I found his sister had remarked me favorably, and thought me very good looking. Here was encouragement for me. Of course I sent word back that she was the loveliest girl I had ever seen. The next day she smiled kindly when she saw me. We were then within a fortnight's sail of Bombay. I used bitterly to weep in the night watches when I thought that on her arrival there I should see her no more. Sometimes I thought of deserting the ship and enlisting as a private in her father's regiment, but then our difference in position would be even greater than now.

At last I summoned up sufficient courage to tell her brother how happy I would be if he could obtain from his sister some little object that I might keep as a memento of her. He asked me what I should like, and I modestly left it to his own discretion. He suggested a lock of hair, to which, as may easily be supposed, I gave a ready consent. I replied that such a gift was more than my wildest imaginations could have hoped for; that the possession of such a treasure would make me happy for life.

Bad weather set in, and I did not see either sister or brother again for some days. He was exceedingly delicate, and, during the rain, his mother confined him a prisoner in the euddy. When I saw him again, he placed in my hands, without saying a word, a small, folded paper, about the size of a shilling. As it evidently contained something, I immediately rushed below, and with some difficulty contrived to open it unseen by any one—no easy task, as solitude is rare in a midshipman's berth. The paper contained a long but very thin tress of bright auburn hair. I knew it immediately by its beautiful color and silky texture to be his sister's.

Never, I believe, was happiness equal to mine at that moment. I that day made, clumsily enough, out of one of my shirts, a small bag. How grateful was I, at the time, for the foresight of our old servant, who had placed a housewife of her own manufacture in my sea chest, and thus, at that critical moment, to supply me with needle and thread. The bag, when finished, was just large enough to hold the hair in its paper envelope. Out of respect to my treasure, I had taken particular pains in making the bag, and was not a little proud of it when it was finished. When all was ready, I fastened it to a piece of spun yarn, placing it round my neck, and wore it next to my heart with all the respect due to a saintly relic.

The ship arrived at Bombay.

On the day of Maria's departure I determined to speak to her. It required no little courage, but true love will encounter any risk. An opportunity presented itself. She was standing near the gangway, a little behind her family, who were waiting for a boat to take them on shore.

"Thanks, a thousand thanks," I said, "for your kind present. I wear it next my heart, and it shall never leave me."

The girl looked intensely astonished. "I don't understand you," she said aloud.

Her mother hearing her speak, looked rough, and asked her what she had said.

"This gentleman," said Maria, hesitatingly, "made some remark, but I did not hear what he said."

"What is it you want, young man?" asked her mother, haughtily.

I was so taken aback that I could not answer a word, but sneaked sheepishly away.

The mother mentioned the circumstance to her husband, who immediately reported my behavior to the officer of the watch. This brute, from his blackguardism, had been obliged to quit the navy, and had afterwards been received for his superior (by comparison) gentlemanly behavior into the East India service, questioned me upon the subject, but I refused to answer him a word, and was in consequence sent to the masthead as a punishment.

The old sinner of a mother suspected there was something concealed, and, of course, she determined to find out. I was again questioned, but revealed nothing.

Before the ship left Bombay, I was allowed one day's holiday on shore, and there by chance, I met Maria's young brother. I requested him to tell me how the mistake occurred, and the cause of my making such a fool of myself. I found that it was true that it was his sister's hair I had been wearing, but she was not aware of its being in my possession. During the week he had been confined to the cabin by the wet weather, he had taken the opportunity of collecting from his sister's hair brush the stray hairs, and with them had formed the tress he had given me. He had thought the possession of it was all that I had wished for, and that how it was obtained was a matter of little importance.

A PRETTY SWINDLE.—An ingenious trick has just been detected in Paris. A man and woman worked it. The man would go into a shop and make a small purchase of a few sous only, for which he paid with a five-franc or ten-franc piece, and received the change. Immediately after his departure his female confederate would enter and also make a small purchase. Then, after looking at other goods for a few minutes, she would politely ask for her change, and when the shop-keeper denied having received any coin from her, she would reply that he must have forgotten, and that if he looked in his till he would find a piece with a certain mark on it. On finding such a piece the astonished tradesman would, of course, give the change with many apologies.

IMPORTANT DECISION.—Everybody is going to buy HOLIDAY PRESENTS, at extremely low prices, at FELDBUSH & CO.'s, because they have the largest assortment and most magnificent display of FANCY GOODS AND TOYS ever seen in any part of the world, which are now being unpacked and offered for sale at wholesale, at No. 531 Washington street, and retail at No. 207 Montgomery street, in Russ House Block, San Francisco.

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electro-pathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathize with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required! All letters answered with promptness and with pleasure, if directed to

A LOST DAY.

FROM the shadowy shores of Dreamland,
In a far and etherial zone,
I have come unto earth; and I know not
Where the beautiful Day has flown!

For gazing, at early dawning,
Where bright in the radiant east
The glittering sun swam, golden,
Through billows of crimson mist—

My soul floated out on the ether,
Swift-winged and free as the Light—
Nor ever, till dawn grew to darkness,
Returned from its airy flight.

I never shall know of its journey:]
I have questioned, all in vain,
The source of the wonderful visions
That are thronging my puzzled brain.

Strange voices; strange, beautiful faces;
Strange fashions of men and dress,
And words whose mystical meaning
I have striven in vain to guess:]

Strange cities, that mirror the sunlight
From minaret, mosque and dome;
And tropical islands, up-springing
From couches of feathery foam—

All glimmer, and gleam, and glisten,
Floating on in a magical stream,
Yet shadowed and vague and misty
As the memory of a dream.

And I stand, as at early dawning;
But where, in the radiant east,
The glittering sun swam, golden,
Through billows of crimson mist,

There is only this soft, white crescent,
And the daisy-faced stars, full-blown
In the garden of Night; and I know not
Where the beautiful Day has flown.

THE "BAL COSTUME."

[LEARNING that a grand fancy Ball was about to take place at the Cosmopolitan Hotel, and being determined that THE CALIFORNIAN should not be surpassed in enterprise by any of its contemporaries, we immediately engaged the exclusive services of a young man by the name of Jenkins to report the affair in extenso, and to that end had him placed in the orchestra, under the disguise of a Cornet-à-piston, which position afforded him an excellent opportunity to witness —the bustle and the raree show,

That occupied the world below,
Secure and at his ease.

The result fully repaid our exertions, for he produced the most flattering and highly-colored description that can be imagined, and which we fondly hoped to lay before our anxious readers. An unforeseen accident, however, which it is impossible to explain, has prevented us from doing so, and we have nothing better to offer than the following letter, which in our distress at the loss of the before-mentioned description, was presented to us by a young friend in the humbler walks of life; he had in a fit of jealousy surreptitiously extracted it from the pocket of his sweetheart, Bridget Kenny, who had been entrusted by her mistress to convey it to the post office—he had read it and declared it was "better nor nothing." We faintly remonstrated, but he only remarked: "It won't no matter; folks didn't never get their letters until a few months after they were posted, and if we felt had about it he would take it to the post office when we had done with it." We have, however, thought it better to retain the letter in our possession, and, on applying at this office it will be returned to the owner, upon paying the expenses of this advertisement.]

MY DEAR LUCY.—I promised when I last wrote to you to give you an account of the Fancy Ball at the Cosmopolitan Hotel, and now I'm sure I don't know where to begin. In the first place I had a great deal of difficulty in persuading mamma to let me go; that horrid Mrs. Grundy who lives, as you know, next door to us, would not let Jane go. She said: "The idea of her daughter going to a hotel ball—a young lady in her position; how should she ever be able to look the bony tong in the face afterwards?" Mamma said: "Then of course you have returned your tickets?" "No, indeed," she cried, "and I don't mean to!" "But," said mamma, "as a matter of common politeness!" "Bosh!" elegantly replied Mrs. G. "Who ever heard of common politeness to hotel keepers?" You see she completely ignored the Committee, who certainly deserved common politeness for their trouble, and who perhaps will not take quite so much another time. I could not help thinking of the burlesque of Aladdin, which you and I used to laugh at so much in London—you remember, no doubt, where the "Princess" is describing "Aladdin's" pedigree and performances to her maids of honor; she says:

"I may as well at once the truth declare,
His mother was a washerwoman—there!"

With a slight alteration this would be quite applicable to Mrs. Grundy. I don't think, however, that Jane knows anything about it; I believe she has an idea that she is related in some way to the Emperor Maximilian, and that common politeness, or common civility, is only expected from common people.

After Mrs. Grundy's visit and her enumeration of a long list of her acquaintances, who, she said, "did not mean to notice the thing at all," mamma seemed rather dubious about my going; but just then papa came in, and after hearing the whole story, said: "Pooh, nonsense, let the girl go and enjoy herself; the Ball is all right enough!" and then he told mamma of a great many people that were going, who, to quote Mrs. Grundy, were certainly "bony tong," if there is such a thing in San Francisco. Then we had to decide upon a dress for me, (mamma never goes to balls, you know,) and I was to go with papa and cousin Harry. Cousin Harry was going as a Japanese ambassador, and papa in the uniform of a Black Hussar, in which he meant to call himself "Don Cesar de Bazan." I wanted to go as a Vivandiere, but papa said, no, because my legs were "doubtful." Now they are not doubtful; they measure 14 inches—I measured them myself—and I'm sure that is not doubtful at all! However, it was decided that I should not go as a Vivandiere; but what my dress was, and how it looked, I shall leave cousin Harry to describe. He is to tell you all about the ladies' dresses; he says he agrees with Jimmy Twitcher, who says, "vimmen vos allays spiteful, hever since a pairadise was lost," and that they are not to be trusted in their criticisms of one another. Just now he is spouting Byron on that subject, something about—

"She then surveys, condemns, but pities still Her dearest friends for being dressed so ill."

My cousin, you must know, is a perfect walking Poetical Dictionary, but in this instance he is positively disgusting. I am sure I admire a pretty woman as much as anybody; that is, when I see one I really consider pretty. Well, we went to the Ball, and O Lucy, it was perfect Fairy-land! I had never been in the Hotel before, and had no idea what the ball-room would be like: it was splendid! Fancy a large hall completely lined with mirrors, resplendent with gilding and beautiful carved-work, with nearly three hundred ladies and gentlemen in magnificent fancy-dresses, walking about or dancing. The reflection of the dresses in the mirrors had a lovely effect. I never saw anything before so beautiful, in the shape of a ball. There were no masks, but some of the disguises were perfect, nevertheless. Dr. B— as a Frenchman (I wish you could have seen that wig) was inimitable; some of his most intimate acquaintances did not recognize him, and one lady sent for her husband to "take that horrid Frenchman, who would persist in following her about, away;" and he drove his uniformed professional brother, Dr. W—d, nearly mad by his persistent and perfect French and mystification. Young P— looked very handsome as the "Postilion of Lonjumeau;" and I nearly fell in love with a Mexican Guerrilla—there was only one in the room—but he was a "whole team." I am afraid that is slang, but I know of no other term so expressive. Mr. H. McA— was magnificent as the "Count D'Alembert." Mr. C—h made a good Cardinal but his dress seemed to rather interfere with his dancing. I have no doubt that since the Ball he has privately commiserated that portion of humanity which is condemned to wear petticoats perpetually. Mr. W. N— wore a splendid court suit of the time of Louis XVI. Charley S— as "Masaniello" was correct, in a costume purchased in Naples. R. E. B—r as the coming man of the 20th century, wore a costume defying criticism. Judge L— was excellently gotten up as an English barrister. Sam H— as a "Highland Chief"—accurate and authentic. Mr. B—e made a capital Chinaman. I overheard him telling a lady that his dress belonged to a highly respectable Chinese merchant, and was all silk, and as he lifted up his skirts to shew her that such was the fact, I am able to affirm that he spoke truth. I don't believe he was ever so happy before in all his life; like the Persians he will mark that day (or night) with a white stone. Louis J—n, a pretty little fellow, as a Mexican vaquero, cavalier, or something of that kind, wore real jingling silver buttons all over his pantaloons. Charlie Le G—, as "Pierrot," made a great deal of fun, and no one could find fault with his poking his nose around as he did, because it was a false as well as a funny one. William P. D—, in a very tasteful character, was certainly "on velvet," and behaved as well as he looked.

Charley L— was quite fascinating as a nice little horse jockey. Mr. McD—, as a Yankee, looked very funny, he is so tall. He distributed pea-nuts, which, by the by, were very bad ones. I received a handful from him, and as I am vulgar enough to like pea-nuts, I retired into a corner to eat them, and I regret to say there was not a good one among them.

Mr. P.—, in English hunting-dress, was perfect, and you know, Lucy, that you and I are judges, having seen a "meet" in a hunting country—which I am sorry to say this isn't, for anything but Gold and Scandal.

The Army was well represented. I noticed General McDowell, Col. De Russey, Col. Drum, Col. Fry, Col. Winder, Major Kirkham, Major Purdy, Capt. Hoyt, and many others. There were also several very handsome Knights Templar—in fact so many pretty things that I cannot remember half of them.

The Committee (whose names you will find in your note of invitation) looked very well, indeed. Their dress was a sort of Court suit, white satin breeches, etc. I did not see any of what papa calls "doubtful legs" among them—if they were all genuine. I asked Mous. Charles (who got them up regardless of expense) how many pairs of stockings each of them wore; but he was dumb to the voice of the charmer—and I could get nothing out of him. Mr. L—d wore a hunting dress, and looked very well—and—but oh, dear! I can't write any more; cousin Harry says he means to finish the letter himself, and that it is all nonsense describing the costumes of the men, as they all went for fun, and not because they wanted to look handsome. But that is not so, because several came to me and asked me confidentially, how I thought they looked, and if their dresses were becoming; and I know one, who had a very handsome dress made expressly for the ball, who could not be induced to enter the room at all, entirely on account of his legs not showing off so well as he had expected they would.

I am so sorry you could not be here at the Ball; but it would have been rather too much, to expect you all the way from New York. I should, however, advise you to keep the tickets as a kind of certificate of good moral character, showing that a Committee of responsible Citizens have "sat" on you and pronounced you respectable. I think that is why Mrs. Grundy held on to hers; but, mind you, never tell her I said so—her vengeance would pursue me for the rest of my natural life—if she did not contrive some means of shortening it. Adieu! I leave the rest to cousin Harry, who is growing impatient.

MINNIE.

[Minnie steps out, and Cousin Harry comes in. It will be noticed that he breaks into a poetical quotation very soon after starting, and that it is evidently difficult for him to pin himself down to prose in the balance of the letter—this in a manner is excusable, for "lovely woman" and her dress is his theme.]

MY DEAR LUCY.—I would not let Minnie describe the costumes of the ladies, because she isn't to be trusted. She's well enough, but all women are spiteful about one another, and there were some such lovely creatures there, that they made one imagine oneself in Mahomet's Paradise. The ball was magnificently gotten up, and the supper and wines to match. The music was excellent—not too loud—and the ventilation of the room perfect; the dressing-rooms and committee room were beautifully arranged, and neither ladies nor gentlemen were annoyed by persons crowding the halls, as it was feared by some, would be the case. The most perfect order reigned throughout; in short, credit is due to the committee of management, as well as to the generous proprietors of this really splendid establishment.

I had a jolly time, I can tell you. I wish I were going again to-night. There were some very beautiful women there, and the fancy dresses certainly augmented their charms. Mrs. McA—, as "Queen of Spades," was lovely. Her dress was black velvet and lace, and scarlet satin, and gold, and silver, and diamonds, and the prettiest little feet in the world. Why is it not fashionable always to wear short skirts? I did not before believe there were so many pretty women in San Francisco, modern fashion disguises them so much. Mrs. McD—, as a "Marquise," with powdered hair, looked very handsome. Mrs. V—, a la Pompadour, looked splendid; I never saw her looking so well before. Mrs. H—, as "Lady Teazle," was magnificent; blue brocade dress, trimmed with white lace and pink roses, blue satin petticoat and powdered hair. Mrs. L—d, as "Night"—black lace dress, covered with silver stars, head-dress, with crescent moon—looked very handsome. Miss T—r personated a bewitching Spanish girl. Mrs. S—t, of Nevada, was the "Rebecca" of Ivanhoe, covered with diamonds and quite oriental in her style of beauty. Mrs. T—, of Virginia City, as the "Lady Rowena," very graceful in white moire antique and blue robe trimmed with swan's down, coronet and veil. Mrs. Col. F—y, as a "Sybil," looking much more like a merry school girl wanting her fortune told than a Sybilline oracle; though her dress was excellently in character, her laughing features would peep out. Mrs. Col. L—d, as a "Peasant girl of Bretagne," was perfect; her dress was one of the most effective in the room. Mrs. S— W—h was "Undine," her beautiful hair floating over a dress of sea-green tulle, trimmed with coral and sea weed, wreath of coral and veil. What shall I say of Miss B—e, lovely Indian maiden, fascinating Minnehaha?

"Feet as rapid as the river,
Tresses flowing like the water,
And as musical a laughter."

I dare not say more or Minnie will be spiteful, and somebody else will pull my ears. There were five "Dianas"—Miss F—, Miss A—, Miss D—, Mrs. R—, and another lady whose name I do not know, all looking lovely in white tulle and silver, with bows, arrows, and crescent moons. Mrs. S— as a "Quakeress" attracted a great deal of attention, and supported the character admirably. Mrs. C. McA— looked very graceful in a dress of the "Ancient Régime." Mrs. G—n as "Queen of Clubs," in a violet-colored dress, covered with clubs formed of black velvet, looked very handsome.

Her sister, Miss K—, as a Fairy, in pink tulle, with golden wings, was bewitching. Miss H—r, as Undine, showed her magnificent blonde hair to great advantage. Mrs. C—, as a Turkish lady, all scarlet and gold, was very attractive—but it is impossible to remember all. There were, Polish, French, German and Neapolitan Peasants, Goddesses of Liberty, wickedly bent on enslaving everybody. All the seasons were represented—Spring, Summer, and Autumn; there was "Little Red Riding Hood" and if the original one looked half as nice, I don't wonder the wolf was tempted to eat her. There were Daughters of the Regiment and Bohemian Girls, all pretty women—amongst them Paris could never have come to any decision about the Golden Apple. Miss McN—y, as a Daughter of the Regiment, looked pretty and pleasing enough to tempt one "to choose to be" a soldier or a Son of the Regiment. Mrs. H—t, as a vivandiere, was well costumed and carried off the keg admirably. Mrs. M—t, as a Spanish Lady, (I do not remember what date the costume represented,) displayed a very rich and tasteful attire, leaving too early, however, for me to take in all its points. Miss C—P—, as "Lady Blessington," looked very graceful and ladylike. Miss H—y, of Sonoma, looked very stylish, though I am unable to describe her dress. Mrs. M—r, as "Esmeralda," never looked so pretty in her life before, though she had forgotten her tamborine. Miss D—m, as "Spring," with Miss De R— (two very young ladies) looked very pretty, and highly delighted with everything around them. I have no doubt they thought how nice it would be to be a big girl and have lots of beaux—like some of the young ladies there. Mrs. W—y, looked very dignified and commanding, as "Queen Catharine of Arragon," in a dress of black velvet, trimmed with ermine. I know there are ever so many more. I ought to have told you about, but after the Fireman's Ball, to which I am going this evening, I will endeavor to find out all the rest of the characters represented, and Minnie shall tell you in her next letter.

Yours sincerely, HARRY HIGHFLIER.

P. S.—I forgot all about Minnie's dress. However it was green, trimmed with red and yellow and lots of other things, and she didn't have any "character" at all—she just went as a lady.

ANOTHER ACCOUNT.

[As though Emilie had overheard Cousin Harry's spiteful declaration that women could never speak any good of each other, scarcely had the preceding article been put in type than the express brought the following one to our desk. A moment before we had been lamenting over having no account of the Ball at all, and lo! five minutes more brought us two. Though placed somewhat in the position of the Frenchman who had long desired an heir, and whose wife finally presented him with triplets, we determined to publish both. It will be seen that a slight discrepancy exists, Minnie setting Mrs. H. McA. down as a "Queen of Spades," while Emilie writes her up as the "Queen of Clubs"—in either case we dare hazard the assertion that the lady is a trump.]

SANTA CLAUS has had a powerful rival this year. In truth he has been nearly crowded from his throne. The little ones were true to their allegiance, but the children of a larger growth were more engrossed by the anticipation of the scene of Fairy-land, that was to be granted to the view of mortals, to contrast for a brief moment with this work-day world of stocks and mines. This grand event was the Fancy Ball to be given on the 23d, at the Cosmopolitan.

But I must go on to tell my share in it, for of course I had a share or I could not describe it; a woman can't write about anything she hasn't seen—has no inventive genius, you know. I was very glad, after hearing of the peculiarly choice affair this ball was intended to be, to get my ticket, not because I needed to be assured that I was not skim-milk, while some others were creme de la creme—for owing to the wish to prevent a crowd, many a rich gout of creme was not there—but simply because many friends were going, and I thought it possible I might wish to go, too. Nevertheless, I did determine the matter until the very day of the ball, for a fitting costume for my peculiar style was not easy to find. Unfortunately I belong to the pathetic order of heroines who look very well in a picture or perched on a pedestal, but are not at all adapted to the round dances of which I am very fond. I told some friends I might go as "Evangeline," wear a waterproof and sit on a rock; or I might go as a picturesque beggar girl, only that was not a sufficiently Fancy costume in these hard times; but at last I made a selection, which just enabled me to get in and see the brilliant array presented by others. It was very inconvenient to come over from Oakland and dress at the Hotel, and the weather, too, was horrid; but what will not one do for such a ball as this promised to be! And there was an immense deal to be done, even after being safely housed in a warm bright room at the Occidental. Oh, that temper-trying ordeal of dressing and seeing others dress for a ball! Why must we have back hair to arrange, and all the array of braids, puffs and curls, to say nothing of rats, mice, etc., while gentlemen have nothing to do but take a brush in each hand, and ten minutes' exercise and his hair is ready for inspection! What a scene must have been presented in the Occidental, and sundry other houses in town, if a certain gentleman upon two sticks could have stripped the roots off! Luckily, that was not done, so nobody knew what a pet we had all been in, when we couldn't find the hair-pins, and the slippers didn't fit, and the wrong necklace was brought, and so on through the long list of inevitable mishaps. But the successful results smoothed away the frowns, and toilette horrors, and all other horrors were forgotten, when, after throwing off wraps in the dressing-room, and giving the emphatic touches and shakes without which no lady is willing to enter a ball-room, we were ushered within the scene of enchantment.

The "co-deel" as a friend of ours calls it, was most beautiful, but I had but a moment to enjoy it, for there was a most ravishing Redowa just started, and I was soon flying off on willing feet, with one of the best dancers in the city. Oh, wasn't I glad then that I wasn't Evangeline sitting on a rock; the Redowa was so much nicer!

After that I walked round the room, looking at the dresses, and wondering what people thought of mine. First I saw, stepping most gracefully towards me, in the daintiest little boots, Mrs. McA. She was "Queen of Clubs," and with the rich black velvet dress, with cards of the suit surrounded by silver ornamenting the skirt and cap, the idea was beautifully carried out. There was only one fault that could have been found—that she had not taken her proper title of "Queen of Hearts." Then came "Aurora," (Miss H.) with beautiful mingling of pink and white, in complexion as well as dress, and with magnificent hair which even the envious veil could not conceal.

In charming contrast to this costume, the next my eye rested upon was a glorious "Night" (Mrs. L.) dark and bright, with all the witchery of the noon of night about her. Near her stood "Undine" (Miss N.) in showy white, with lilies and trailing water plants, looking lovely enough to lure any Hildebrand through flood or fire. Then I heard close beside me a silvery laugh, and turning saw "Marie Fille du Regiment," looking even more bewitching than usual in the tasteful dress she had chosen, the white jacket and skirt and taking little hat and dear little boots! Talking with her was Flora McFlimsey and Friend Ruth all in one person; the dress was divided, one side yellow silk and crape with red roses and birds; the other side gray mousseline with plain cap and kerchief.

Next my attention was attracted by a crowd of gentlemen very much interested in something or somebody, and on drawing near found that the centre of the group was a "Sybil" (Mrs. F.) very handsomely dressed in velvet skirt and red jacket and turban, with a profusion of barbaric ornaments; but in one respect she differed from the Sybils of old, they were very sparing of their words, and could not have been very agreeable company, while this their representation was keeping her admirers enchained by her sparkling jests and piquant application of her Sybilline Leaves. A little further on in the midst of a constellation of bright stars (and straps) stood Mrs. McD. stately and gracious, in a court dress of rich silk, ornamented with bows of lace, put on as only a French dress-maker can.

Next I met "Minne-ha-ha," (Miss B.) in the only becoming Indian dress I ever saw; and the combined effect of dress and wearer was most captivating. Then Mrs. Dr. T. B., with her fine figure and graceful carriage supporting well the character of a Marquise, with her splendid hair partly in cushion and partly sweeping in curls over her shoulder; the dress was rich silk, with a train, the whole ornamented with knots of pink silk, and looked as if she had been standing under a rose tree and roses and petals had showered over her. By her side stood Mrs. M., in a superb Spanish dress of black velvet, with lace shawl, high comb and rich jewels. Then Mrs. DeR., very handsome, in Court dress, with powdered hair, and her little daughter most appropriately as "Morning Star." Miss S. D. as "Spring," the charm and freshness of which was suggested by the wearer as well as the dress. My attention was next attracted by a charmingly piquant face, exquisite complexion, and glorious auburn hair, which is my weakness; I found the fortunate possessor was Miss K., in a very beautiful Greek dress. She was very bewitching as she tapped her little heels and set the bells ringing. Next I met the beautiful sisters, Mrs. G. and Miss K., the first as "Queen of Clubs," and the latter as a butterfly, in pink dress, with gauze wings.

After looking at all the bright colors and gay dresses, the eye rested with peculiar pleasure on the sombre dress and spirituelle face of Mrs. S., as a Quaker, in gray mousseline and plain cap. With her versatile powers, and bright spirits, she supported the character well, as she would any that she might select. When I saw her dress, and recollected the Flora and Ruth dress I had just seen, I thought how odd it was that there should be a Quaker and a half at the ball! Mrs. W. was superbly handsome in a rich court dress, while near her Mrs. L. was most bewitching as a "Peasant." Then came Mrs. C. as "Red Riding Hood;" Mrs. C. McA. as "Marie Antoinette," and Miss D. in court dress. It was wonderful to see the variety of court dresses, and all so handsome and becoming. Indeed, I think all were looking their best that night. As for the gentlemen, if they can go back to their funereal evening suits, after looking so handsome in the bravery of fancy costume, then I will acquit them of vanity, henceforth and forever. No, I don't know that I will, either: it may be the very excess of the article: they may think that they do not need such adorning! One thing is certain, that I never received so deep an impression of the beauty of certain people as I did that night; and as I agree with Bulwer that it is our duty to cultivate the Beautiful (with a big B.) I consider it a duty for the gentlemen to let the rainbow tints into their costume de bal, and so make every ball a fairy scene, set apart from the matter-of-fact of Montgomery street. I think it would help to idealize people wonderfully. As for the Committee, with their handsome dress and charming manners, each should have his picture taken, that he may ever remember how handsome he once looked. I wish I could describe the rich and tasteful dress of the many gentlemen I noticed; but I am as much at fault there as a gentleman is among the silks and laces. I can only say that such a dress was handsome, but what made it so is beyond me to tell. Dr. S., in black velvet, H. McA., as "Count d'Alembert," Mr. W., as a chasseur, Mr. C. in a gold-laced dress, and A. S. as a Mexican guerrilla, all looked splendidly handsome. There were two Yankees, both good; one, Dr. W., dressed and acted the character imitatively. C. S. was cool, as usual, in a very becoming fisherman dress; C. L. was a horse jockey; Mr. P. a postillion; Mr. H. a sailor boy; Mr. Le G., "Pierrot." Mr. W., the irrepressibly satirical, was dressed as a Hussar, and called himself "Don Caesar de Bazan;" some one suggested that he must have struck a lead somewhere, for he had shed his rags. Then came B. S., as a whirling Dervish, and Mr. S. in a very effective dress as a Templar Knight, white, with red crosses. There was also a Monk, a Cardinal, and a Clown, and hosts of others coming and going in an ever-changing, ever-beautiful scene. I noticed a Nun, perfectly dressed, dancing the polka, and, in the same, Diana and a Marquise jolted each other. Mrs. W. wore a splendid Court dress of scarlet moire over white, with powdered hair; Miss A. a perfect dress as a Neapolitan peasant; Miss L. also as a peasant; Mrs. H., a vivandiere; and Mrs. K. was a beautiful "Night," starry bright, in a black velvet and spangled veil.

You must not suppose that all this time I was entirely engrossed with my observations of other people. They were taken en passant, while I was engaged with dancing, etc., and some splendid dances I had. The music and floor were excellent, and so were my partners; and one gallop, I remember, as being as near to flying as mortals can hope to come. But all such pleasant pastimes must reach the final hour, "the inevitable hour which comes alike to all," when one's friends are inexorable, and there is no hope even for another dance, save by giving them the slip, and keeping behind tall people, for just one more Lancer. So I got my last dance that night, and so I suppose did many another, but then "Hope, which springs eternal in the human heart," came no longer to me, and lingeringly and ruefully I turned my steps from the bright scene,

And with eyelids sleepy and tired,
And dress all crumpled and torn
I threw myself back in the carriage I'd hired,
And drove home at the breaking of dawn!

NEW YEAR'S EVE.

PUT by thy weary work, wife,
And come and sit by me;
And we will talk of dear old times
And our old home by the sea.
Oh, wipe away your tears, wife;
We surely need not grieve
That the old, old year will die
This bonnie New Year's Eve.

It brought us many griefs, wife,
Though sent they were by God;
It saw us lay our boy to sleep
Beneath the foreign sod;
It knew us in our own land, wife,
Whose shores it saw us leave;
Alack! we'd better, better smile
Than weep this New Year's Eve.

It has seen warm hearts grow chill, wife,
And kindly hands grow cold;
But we'll look forth to the New Year,
And not back to the old.
We'll thank our gracious God, wife,
For gifts we may receive,
We'll thank God for his blessings,
This bonnie New Year's Eve.

The night is cold and clear, wife,
And youthful cheeks are red;
The Old Year lays his trembling hands,
Upon each bended head.
Ah, well! we sit by our quiet fire,
And never think to grieve
That younger hearts will gladder be
This bonnie New Year's Eve.

CLARA CLYDE.

THE LATEST WAR NEWS.

O PALE, pale face! O helpless hands!
Sweet eyes by fruitless watching wronged;
Yet turning ever towards the lands
Where War's red hosts are thronged!

She shudders when they tell the tale
Of some great battle fought and won;
Her sweet child face grows old and pale,
Her heart falls like a stone.

She sees no conquering flag unfurled,
She hears no victory's brazen roar;
But a dear face, which was her world,
Perchance she'll kiss no more!

Ever there comes between her sight
And the glory that they rave about,
A boyish brow and eyes whose light
Of splendor hath gone out.

The midnight glory of his hair,
Where late her fingers, like a flood
Of moonlight, wandered,—lingering there,—
Is still and dank with blood!

She must not shriek, she must not moan,
She must not wring her quivering hands;
But sitting dumb and white, alone,
Be bound with viewless hands.

Because her suffering life infolds
Another dearer, feebler life,
In death-strong grasp her heart she holds,
And still its torturing strife.

Yester eve, they say, a field was won.
Her eyes ask tidings of the fight;
But tell her of the dead alone
Who lay out in the night.

In mercy tell her that his name
Was not upon that fatal list;
That not among the heaps of slain
Dumb are the lips she's kissed!

O poor pale child! O woman heart!
Its weakness triumphed o'er by strength!
Love teaching pain discipline's art,
And conquering at length!

MISS M. E. BRADDON'S NEW NOVEL.

ONLY A CLOD.

By the author of "Aurora Floyd," "Three Times Dead," "Lady Audley's Secret," "The Doctor's Wife," "The Outcasts," etc.

CHAPTER IX.

JULIA DESMOND MAKES HERSELF AGREEABLE.

CAPTAIN MASTERS drove Lionel Hillary's phaeton to the Cedars, when the crowd in the sunny gardens before the Chateau de Bourbon had dispersed, and only a few scattered groups still lingered about the pleasant home of exiled royalty. Amongst which loiterers might be observed some lively gentlemen of the occasional reporter species, who wanted to ascertain whether there would not be something in the champagne and lobster salad way before the fête was finished. Captain Masters drove his friend Mr. Somerset back to the Cedars in the mail phaeton, while Lionel Hillary and Francis Tredethlyn went home with the ladies in the landau.

The man who had been a private soldier only a few months before that day, and who had not yet been able to realize the change made in his position by the inheritance of thirty thousand a year, found himself oppressed by a strange feeling as he sat in Miss Hillary's open carriage, with his back to the horses, surrounded by billows of silk, and lace, and muslin, a surging sea of feminine draperies, from which a faint perfume was wafted towards him as the summer wind blew in his face. It was not so much that he was ill at ease in that feminine presence, or in any way daunted by the fire of two feminine handsome eyes. The feeling which oppressed him was rather a sense of unreality. He was like a child at a pantomime, who sees a stage fairy for the first time, and cannot believe that the resplendent creature is only flesh and blood. He looked at Maude Hillary, and thought of his cousin Susan's rosy cheeks and brown hair, shaded by the familiar dainty sun-bonet. There were men in the world who might aspire to marry such a creature as this Miss Hillary. He tried to imagine the sort of man who might lift his eyes to that divinity, and there arose in his mind the picture of a grandiose creature with yellow whiskers, and a geranium in his button-hole. The æsthetic element in Mr. Tredethlyn's mind was as yet very imperfectly developed; and his idea of a lover befitting Maude Hillary leaned rather to the gaudy king's-pattern order of mankind.

The Australian merchant sat with his head leaning back against the cushions of the carriage, and his eyes closed. His headache was, if anything, worse, he confessed, in answer to Maude's anxious inquiries. He did not speak three times during the homeward drive, and his daughter rarely took her eyes from his face. She was very fond of him, and displayed her affection for him now as frankly as she had done when she had been a little girl in a white frock, sitting on his knee after dinner, and eating unwholesome fruits and confections out of his plate. She watched him now with a tender anxiety in her face, and seemed almost unconscious of the presence of the big soldier-like individual with a bronzed countenance and close-cropped black hair. But Francis Tredethlyn was not entirely neglected, for Miss Desmond appeared determined to atone for Maude's want of courtesy. She had heard the Cornishman's story from Mr. Somerset, who had heard it from a gentleman whom he described as "a fellow in the 11th Hussars;" and the handsome Julia felt some little interest in the hero of the narrative. An ignorant young man—a farmer's son—who has suddenly come into a fortune of thirty thousand a year is not the sort of person to be met with every day. Julia remembered that dreary ruin, that tall stone jail on the bare hill beyond Limerick, which sounded so well when casually alluded to as Castle Desmond; but whose image chilled her as it rose, dismal and stony, before her mind's eye. She remembered the muddy roads, the murderous ruts, the broad acres of irredeemable bog, the long rank grass waving on the roofs of tumble-down stone cabins, the gaunt pigs, and gaunter peasantry; and a feeling that was not altogether ignoble kindled a sudden flush upon her handsome face. What could not be done for Castle Desmond and those ill-used peasantry by a chieftainess who should have thirty thousand a year at her command! She fancied herself a kind of fairy queen, beneath whose wondrous pleasant homesteads might arise on those desolate hills, and yellow corn-fields spread a golden mantle over the valleys now so bare and empty. Miss Desmond's lot in life was altogether exceptional, and the sentimental dreams which come to some young women had no lodgment in her brain. She looked her fate straight in the face, and was eager to make the best of any opportunity that might fall in her way. For the present she was very well off where she was; though the worship of the golden calf, as represented by Maude Hillary, was a perpetual abomination to her. But she was tolerably resigned to her present position at the Cedars. It was only in the future that her life looked dark and threatening. She must marry before Miss Hillary—that was essential—or else she must resign herself to the miserable position of a companion on sufferance—necessary to Maude, perhaps, but very disagreeable to Maude's husband.

Under these circumstances a chance visitor at the Cedars, with thirty thousand a year for his fortune, was not a person to be disdainfully entreated even by the daughter of all the Desmonds; so Julia was very kind to Francis Tredethlyn during that brief homeward drive, asked him all manner of questions respecting his sentiments upon things in general and the charity fête in particular, and flashed her handsome eyes and white teeth upon him until he was almost dazzled by their brightness. Miss Desmond had very dark eyes, eyes that seemed of a greenish hazel when you saw them in repose, but which looked almost black when they sparkled athwart a fringe of dusky lashes. She had dark eyes and very white teeth, and the distinguishing characteristic of her face was the contrast between the darkness of one and the white glitter of the other. Mr. Tredethlyn knew that the young lady was very handsome, and that there was some condescension involved in her friendly notice of him; but his eyes wandered away to Maude's fair face and earnest blue eyes, and there was a suspicion of irrelevance in some of his replies to Miss Desmond's animated questions. If he had been less absent-minded, he might have seen that young lady's white teeth close vengefully upon her lower lip as she turned from him after one of those doubtful answers.

The dinner at the Cedars went off very quietly. Mr. Hillary was silent but hospitable, or at least as much so as a man can be in these days of Russian dinners and vicarious hospitality. Francis had lodged at a comfortable hotel in the regions of Covent Garden since his return from Cornwall, and had in no way altered his simple habits of life, so he was not a little puzzled by the array of glasses by the side of his plate, the lumps of ice which an obsequious attendant dropped ever and anon into his Moselle, the mysterious compounds in silver dishes which he discovered suddenly at his elbow whenever he was most abstracted by the novelty of the scene about him, and the vision of Maude Hillary, sitting on the other side of the round table in a cloud of white and blue. The dishes at that wonderful feast seemed so many culinary conundrums to Mr. Tredethlyn, and I fear that he made some very obvious mistakes in the management of the spoons and forks perpetually thrust upon him by the stealthy-footed retainers. But the dinner was over at last, and Captain Masters opened the dining-room door for the departure of the ladies, while poor Francis could only sit blankly staring like a countryman at a play. Lionel Hillary did not linger long over his wine; he had some papers to look at in his study, he said, and excused himself on that ground, as well as on account of that obstinate headache of his. The young men seemed very glad to be released from the atmosphere of hothouse flowers and pine-apple, faintly mingled with that odor of the bygone dinner which will hang round the most elegant dining-room, ventilate it as you will. Was not Maude Hillary in the drawing-room, whence already might be heard the sparkling ripple of arpeggio passages upon the piano? The two young loungers followed Mr. Hillary out into the hall, and Francis went with them, uncomfortably conscious of disadvantages not to be outbalanced by the possession of half a million or so in all manner of seven-per-cent.-paying investments. The young soldier, blacking his master's boots, had been the easiest mannered of mankind; but Oliver Tredethlyn's heir felt terribly embarrassed in Maude Hillary's presence—only in her presence; he was not at all abashed by Miss Desmond's eyes and teeth, though all their contrastive brightness was brought to bear upon him. Maude was at the piano, and Julia was bending over a stand of engravings. It may be that she had not very long fallen into that graceful attitude. When the three young men entered the room she looked up, and Mr. Tredethlyn meeting her friendly glance, and being considerably at a loss what to do with himself, went over to her, and found a comfortable haven in a low easy chair near the couch on which she was sitting.

"Do you care much for Leech, Mr. Tredethlyn?" she asked, as she turned over the leaves of a portfolio reprinted from Punch.

The young man looked rather puzzled by this question.

"I don't care much for them," he answered, frankly. "I never had any but once, and that was in Van Diemen's Land, when I had the fever—fifteen of them on my temples, and that was no joke, you know, Miss Desmond."

He was quite at ease with Julia, but he would not for the world have been so confidential to Maude Hillary. Miss Desmond laughed good-naturedly.

"I don't mean those horrible creatures that they put on one's temples," she exclaimed, "but Mr. John Leech, the caricaturist. You must have seen Punch, even in Van Diemen's Land."

"Oh, yes! my mas—superior officer used to get it from his mother every mail."

He took the portfolio from Miss Desmond and turned over the leaves; but he only stared absently at Mr. Leech's most brilliant performances, and his eyes wandered away every now and then to the piano, where Maude Hillary was skimming through the genus of a new opera and dallying with her two adorers, deliciously unconscious of their adoration. Had she not inhabited an atmosphere of universal admiration and affection ever since she had exhibited her pink cheeks and infantile ringlets in company with the seven-shilling March peaches and five guinea pine-apples, after her father's pompous dinners, to be admired by ponderous old city magnates in the pauses of solemn discussions upon the rate of discount and the last grand crash on the Stock Exchange?

Julia Desmond, always observant—cursed perhaps with an especial faculty for penetrating all unpleasant secrets lying hidden under the many masks which society has invented for the convenience of mankind—Miss Desmond, I say, was not slow to perceive the Cornishman's pre-occupation, nor slow to credit Miss Hillary with another item in that heavy account so long standing between them.

"Even this country boor, with a great fortune for his own, must pay his meed of homage to the millionaire's daughter," thought Julia. "Is there some magical power in the possession of money, which imparts a kind of fascination to the possessor?" Colonel Desmond's daughter had felt some of the keenest stings of poverty, and it may be that she had grown to entertain an exaggerated estimation of that golden dross which is so paltry a thing when considered in a philosophical spirit. She looked at the young man sitting by her side, and as she looked a mystic golden halo seemed to arise about him and surround him, until he appeared almost like an old picture of a saint, painted upon a shadowless background of gold. Thirty thousand a year! and he was young, handsome, manly, good-tempered-looking, or even something more than this; for there was a dash of nobility in his simple bearing which scarcely seemed to belong to the runaway-son of a small farmer. The good old blood of the Tredethlyns, once squires and land-owners of some degree, was not dishonored by the young man who had blacked Harcourt Lowther's boot in Van Diemen's Land. He was not a gentleman after the manner of the nineteenth century; he seemed rather like a stalwart soldier of the past, simple and daring, frank and generous. Julia, contemplating him always enframed in the golden halo, saw that with the advantage of a clever woman's training he might be made a very presentable creature, in spite of that private soldier story, which, after all, was spiced with a certain flavor of romance.

"People would say I married him for his money," thought Miss Desmond; "but then they would say that if I married a provincial banker with fifteen hundred a year. Thirty thousand! thirty thousand a year! and he is not a man who would act meanly in the matter of a settlement—and he could buy the Irish estate for a mere song—and he might call himself Tredethlyn Desmond."

Maude Hillary's companion and friend had employed herself for a very long time in the consideration of one grand subject—her own destiny. For a long time she had estimated every creature who came in her way by one unvarying gauge. Had he, or had he not, any bearing on that supreme question? If the answer were in the negative, Miss Desmond wasted no further thought upon the useless creature. But if she saw in the shadowy distance some possible combination of circumstances in which the individual might become a thread, however slightly interwoven, in the fabric of her destiny, Julia expended her brightest smiles and sweetest words for his gratification.

It was in no way strange, therefore, that the young lady who had given a good deal of attention to hare-brained young ensigns and penniless young curates with nothing better than remote expectations, should consider Mr. Tredethlyn worthy of her most serious deliberation. The present, however, was no time for thought—for were not the young man's eyes perpetually wandering towards the slender figure under the light of the moderator lamp? Miss Desmond felt there was no time to be lost. Already the rich man had made his election—already he had enrolled himself in the list of Maude Hillary's victims. Another woman, perceiving the state of affairs, might have resigned herself to the loss of this grand chance of winning a rich husband; but Julia's courage was not so easily dashed. It rose, rather, with the thought of contest. Had not her father been a grand old freebooter, boasting of kingly blood in his battered old body, and spilling it under the colors of every rebel army in modern Europe? The Desmond spirit rose in Julia's breast as she saw Francis Tredethlyn's wandering glances, half sheepish, half unconscious.

"I can set myself against her this time," she thought; "and the battle between us will be a fair one. This man cannot be a fortune-hunter. We meet on tolerably equal terms for once in a way, Miss Hillary, and let us see who will win."

Julia's dark eyes flashed their brightest as she looked across all the width of the room to the radiant-looking girl at the piano; and then she turned them suddenly upon Francis Tredethlyn, and began to talk to him. She began to talk to him, and more than this, she made him listen to her. Miss Desmond was a brilliant talker. She possessed that wondrous faculty vulgarly called the gift of the gab—the power of talking about everything and anything, or even about nothing, for the matter of that; the power of enchaining a listener in spite of himself, holding him prisoner when he had rather be away, and yet not detaining him an altogether unwilling prisoner; the power of talking ignorantly without seeming to be ignorant; speculating ideas and allusions at a venture, and never betraying the shallowness of their nature; assuming an interest in the most uninteresting subject, and never revealing the hollowness of the assumption—a power, in short, which in its fascination seems like a modern form of those classic philtres which Roman maidens were wont to administer to eligible bachelors in the days when Rome was young. It may be that Miss Desmond owned this faculty in some degree to her Hibernian ancestry; but no suspicion of their native accent vulgarized her discourse. Only a softer and richer depth in her low voice betrayed her Celtic origin.

Julia began to talk to Francis Tredethlyn, and, in spite of himself, he listened, and was fain to withdraw his gaze from the distant figure at the piano. She talked to him of a soldier's life, jumping recklessly at conclusions, and taking it for granted that he must needs possess some latent spark of military ardor which would blaze up into a flame under the fire of her enthusiasm. She talked to him of her father, and all those guerrilla warfares in which he had won distinction. She talked of Don Carlos and Abd-el-Kader, and Garibaldi, whose name had not then the glorious significance which it carries with it at the present day. She talked to him like a young Joan of Arc, or an embryo maid of Saragossa, and all that was brightest in Mr. Tredethlyn's nature kindled beneath her influence. Had Francis been a stockbroker, Miss Desmond would have discoursed to him of Lionel Rothschild, or Lafitte, or Mires; and she would have glowed with just the same enthusiasm though her theme had been the Stock Exchange or the Bourse.

But in spite of himself Mr. Tredethlyn was pleased and interested. His boyish yearning for a military career had been very nearly trampled out of him during dreary years of parhings and counter-marchings, and sword exercise, and barrack tyranny, with never the glimpse of a battle-field, or so much as a brief skirmish with some chance enemy. But those fresh young feelings all came back to him when Julia discoursed in low, eloquent accents of her father's foreign experience. "Ah, that was something like a military career!" thought the young man. "It was such a life that I hoped to lead when I ran away from Landresdale; and I thought I would come back a general, with a cocked-hat and a great plume of feathers, as the gardeuer's son does in the play I saw once at Falmouth."

And then Francis Tredethlyn, being by nature candid as a schoolboy newly come home for his holidays, opened his heart to Miss Desmond, and told her a good deal about his life. That dark chamber of his memory in which Susan's image loomed through the sombre shadows he kept religiously sealed from every curious eye. But on all other subjects he was very communicative. He did not tell Julia that he had been Mr. Lowther's body-servant; for there was something in that estate of servitude which had never been entirely pleasant to him, gallantly as he had borne himself under its serious ordeals. He had known poverty, he told Miss Desmond, in all its worst bitterness, and had seen his mother and father die broken-hearted, borne down by a load of petty debt and difficulty, when the loan of a couple of hundred pounds would have saved them.

"I felt altogether desperate one night, Miss Desmond," he said, "when my poor mother was at her worst, and my father sitting in the kitchen as helpless as a child—almost daft, as they say in the north. I felt desperate somehow, and I went out of the house and ran all the way to Tredethlyn Grange, and asked my uncle Oliver to lend me the money. He laughed in my face, Miss Desmond, and told me he hadn't a five-pound note in the house; and I dare say he spoke the truth, for I think he'd have gone half crazy at the thought of a sovereign lying idle. I went back to the farm, and—my mother died the next day."

He stopped, and sat for some minutes looking at Mr. Hillary's Axminster carpet. Julia did not say anything. She was too perfect a tactician not to know that anything she could say must appear commonplace at such a moment. She only drew a long breath, a kind of fluttering sigh, expressive of the deepest sympathy.

"My mother died, Miss Desmond," the young man went on, "and my father was not slow to follow her. So, having no one in the world to care for, except—except a cousin, who had been like a sister to me, I ran away to Falmouth and enlisted in a foot regiment, thinking that I had but to pin a bunch of colors in my hat and march straight off to some field of battle. I left Cornwall, Miss Desmond, but I never forgot that night before my mother's death. I've tried to feel grateful to my uncle Oliver for leaving me this fortune, but I can't. I ought to feel grateful, I suppose; but I can't. The memory of that night sours me somehow. Money seems such paltry stuff, after, when you think that all the golden coin in this world can't bring back one human creature from the grave."

"Ah, yes, indeed," Miss Desmond murmured, in her tenderest voice.

And then, being blest with a very lively imagination, she found herself wondering whether, if wealth had been potent to restore the dead, and she had been possessed of wealth, she would have very much cared to awaken Patrick Macnamara Ryan O'Bryan Desmond from his quiet slumber in a little churchyard beside the windmill Shannon. The old soldier of fortune was better in his grave, perhaps, Julia thought, philosophically. She had begun to fight the battle of life on her own tactics, and had no very great opinion of her late father's strategy.

"He was very clever," she thought, with a tender remembrance of the Major's best manoeuvres; "but then one so often saw through him. He always started with wrong premises, and fancied every one but himself was a fool—as if there could be any merit in deceiving only stupid people." Miss Desmond was always wise enough to remember that the larger art of talking well comprehends the smaller art of listening gracefully. She was not one of those obnoxious people who talk for the sake of talking; and who, after rattling on without a full stop for half an hour at a stretch, will stare vacantly at you while you recite to them some interesting adventure, thinking of what they mean to say next, and waiting for the chance of cutting in. Julia Desmond talked with a purpose, not because she wanted to talk, but because she wished to please; and now she listened to Francis Tredethlyn with an unflinching show of sympathy and interest, that beguiled him on to tell her more and more. She wound and insinuated herself into his confidence as a beautiful serpentine creature winds itself into the heart of an apparently impenetrable forest; and before the evening was finished, Mr. Tredethlyn found himself almost as intimate with this splendid southern Irishwoman as if she had been his sister. She had set him completely at his ease, so that he no longer felt out of place in Mr. Hillary's gorgeous rooms; and when the merchant, coming into the drawing-room at eleven o'clock, very pale and worn-looking, asked him to dine at the Cedars on the following Sunday, Francis unhesitatingly accepted the invitation. He stole just one glance at Maude as he did so, but she was in the act of exhibiting one of the newest accomplishments of a mouse-colored Skye terrier for the edification of the two young loungers, and she was quite unconscious of that sly look from Mr. Tredethlyn's eyes. He went to her presently to wish her good night, and the spell of her gracious presence dazed and bewildered him, to the cost of the mouse-colored terrier, upon whose silky paws he trampled in his embarrassment; and then, essaying to shake hands in a gentlemanly manner, he forgot what a stalwart giant he was, and squeezed the little hand that rested so lightly in his, until Maude's fingers were wounded by the hoops, and clusters, and hearts, and crescents of diamonds and opals which twinkled and flashed upon them—for Miss Hillary had seen the Marchioness of Londonderry's famous rings, and never wore any vulgar mixture of many-colored jewels upon her pretty white hands. Francis lingered a little after saying good night, helpless under the spell of the enchantress, and then made his way somehow or other out of the room. Ah! surely under uncle Oliver's money was not such sordid dross, after all, when it was the golden key that admitted him to that paradise on the banks of the Thames.

MR. NEIGHBORS.—There are some troublesome neighbors who are the plague of a man's life. They borrow your umbrella when you want to go out, come and pay you a visit when you want to work at home, play the French horn when you want to go to sleep, and give a party on the very evening you want to finish a tragedy. My neighbor has none of these faults, but he contrives to incommode me in some way every moment. He pries into everything in my room, destroys my papers, and devours my breakfast. Butter, cheese, poultry, game, almost everything is acceptable to him; and he never eats bread when he can get cake. He is neither a landowner nor elector, he pays no rent for his apartments, yet lives very comfortably. My neighbor is very gentlemanly in his habits, but never comes home till after midnight, and is fond of serenades and nightly meetings with the objects of his affections. In other respects, his character is good; he is neither a fop nor a bully, and avoids rather than seeks quarrels. He bears no malice towards those who treat him ill, and if you turn him out at one door, he will come back by the other. He goes from house to house, making himself comfortable wherever he goes, and staying till he is tired, without ever waiting for an invitation. Familiar as he is with your provisions, only take the trouble to put the stoppers in your decanters, and he will not meddle with them. He is always well dressed, his boots never creak on the floor, for their soles are of the finest chamois, and the upper leathers of India-rubber. My neighbor, though he knows I must wear a coat out at the elbows, never wears anything but the softest furs. He never lays in fuel, but spends the cold season in my chimney-corner. All this I have to put up with. In fact, I think myself lucky, if he does not invite his friends to his nocturnal orgies, but contents himself with abusing my hospitality, rummaging among my furniture, and plundering my larder. My neighbor is one of those personages who must be well treated. It is well known that whenever he leaves a residence, it is sure to tumble down soon. This troublesome neighbor, dear reader is—a mouse.

USE AND ABUSE OF ICE.—The drinking of iced liquids in considerable quantity is highly injurious, and in some cases their use has been attended with inflammation of the stomach and bowels, and even sudden death—not always accounted for by the person being at the time in a heat. Ice, or iced water, retards digestion, chills the body, and often produces most dangerous congestions. On the other hand, ice or iced water applied in inflammations, croup, etc., has been productive of the best effects; it diminishes the quantity of blood in the vessels, and carries off the excess of heat. A piece of ice laid on the wrist will, in many cases, stop bleeding of the nose. If milk or butter is cooled with ice, it must be used at once, otherwise it will lose its freshness.

ACTION! action! strife! strife! Rest is so crushing; so dismal. Lo! how contrasted the effect of a similar cause of grief at different stages of life. Chase the first dreams of our life, and we cry: Action! strife! In that cry, unconsciously to ourselves, Hope speaks, and proffers worlds of emotion not yet exhausted. Disperse the last golden illusions in which the image of happiness cheats our experienced manhood, and Hope is silent; she has no more words to offer, unless, indeed, she drops her earthly attributes, changes her solemn name, and floats far out of sight as Faith.—E. Bulwer Lytton.

A PLEASANT story is told of a rather aged lady who has recently married a young and fast man, quitting him at the station when he was going en voyage for some private affairs. After an embrace of the most loving character, she put her head into the carriage and said, "Cher Charles, remember that you are married." To which he replied, "Cher Caroline, I will make a memorandum of it," and at once tied a knot in his handkerchief.

YES, "I remember!" And I pray God earnestly, if it be his good pleasure, that I may never lose the blessed memories of the past. O! they are musical, those two words! Memory is, indeed, a good gift, like the voiceless echo that haunts your brain of the song some loved voice has sung.—Hood.

A LADY that would please herself in marrying was warned that her intended, although a good sort of a man, was very singular. "Well," replied the lady, "if he is very much unlike other men, he is much more likely to be a good husband."

A GENTLEMAN says the reason why Jenkins is unlike a dog's tail is, that Jenkins keeps a carriage and the tail keeps a waggin.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1864.

NEW YEARS.

WHILE we write the bells of every steeple in town stand all aquiver to chime the old year out and ring the new one in. With the first stroke of the impatient bells twelve wrinkled moons will fall from their withered stem, and twelve fair blossoms will come to bud and blossom and die in their stead. Time is never at a stand still, and his ranks are filled up right speedily, ushering in the fresh young heir even while the dead miser is being carried over the threshold of the year. In terming the year, whose obituary is now being written by thousands of pens, a miser, do we depart at all from the common custom of the world? The year has served its time; it has worked us all the good it can and is now powerless to injure; it has emptied at our feet all the gifts with which its hands were laden, and has nothing more to give—under these circumstances, having nothing further to hope from it and nothing further to fear, are we not at liberty to speak as ill as we please of the departed and write whatever inscription we choose on the tombstone? To answer our question in the affirmative would betray a vein of feeling a trifle too cynical for New Year's Eve, so let us dismiss the discussion, and speak kindly of the year so soon to be numbered with the many which, like crested waves swell and curl in this world's wake, marking its career over the great sea of Time; let us forget the evil that the year has done and remember only the blessings it has brought, and that these latter have not been few, a retrospective glance can but assure us, red though the record be for Atlantic homes.

What need to look back for blessings when the present moment is fraught with them, and what need to go beyond the door when they lie directly at our threshold? Is not the writer, for instance, sound in his pen-arm and able to flourish his quill without rheumatic twinges, and is not the reader sound in eye-sight and able to read the cleanly-typed pages of THE CALIFORNIAN, peradventure without the aid of spectacles? And beyond the pleasure of writing for THE CALIFORNIAN what pleasure can go, unless it be the one of reading it!

Blessed be the man who first invented New Years! Among nearly all nations it is a time of merriment and rejoicing, a day when old feuds are forgotten and new ones dismissed, when old friendships are renewed and new ones are formed, when neighbor calls on neighbor to extend and take the right hand of fellowship; of all days in the year commend us to New Years as the best in the calendar and the most worthy to be marked with a white stone. True, the day is the memorandum of the subtraction of another year from the little sum of our lives, but if we live as we should it brings us nearer by a year to the promised goal. Charles Lamb, gentle and good heart, who never misappreciated any person or thing in life, had a strong and just appreciation of New Year's Day. He remarks that it can be viewed by no one with indifference. "Of all sounds of bells" he says, "most solemn and touching is the peal which rings out the old year. I never hear it without a gathering up of my mind to a concentration of all the images that have been diffused over the past twelvemonth; all I have done or suffered, performed or neglected, in that regretted time. I begin to know its worth as when a person dies. It takes a personal color, nor was it a poetical flight in a cotemporary, when he exclaimed—

"I saw the skirts of the departing year."

The custom of calls on this day has a deeper signification than is commonly attributed to it. Sometimes degraded into an excuse for wine-bibbing though it be, the custom has still a beautiful appropriateness if we strip it of the baldness which always invests a mere ceremony and clothe it with the idea which is typically conveyed. What day so meet as that which begins the year to take our friends by the hand and pledge faith anew? The old year with the heartburnings and bitter-nesses and jealousies which it may have engendered is at an end, and the new year comes in unstained for us to write upon it whatever record we please. Commencing it by an interchange of courtesies, we in a measure bind ourselves to forbearance and friendship during its continuance—let the host of callers remember this as they go their rounds; let them remember that the wine they put to their lips stands somewhat in the light of that which is drunk in holy communion, being both a symbol and a pledge. Let them also remember, that in New Year's calls, brevity is the soul of civility—and the old form of the proverb, that it is the soul of wit, at this moment occurring to us, we put an immediate period to this article, and present our readers, for their New Years' gift, a short editorial.

DRAMATIC MENTION.

AFTER a successful run of six nights, The Magnolia was withdrawn from the Opera House boards on Thursday evening last to make room for the debut of Miss Ada Clare in the character of "Camille." A rainy afternoon and the Firemen's Ball conspired to cheat the debutante of the house which her literary reputation would undoubtedly have assured for her under other circumstances. The pressure which the holidays and their accompanying festivities inevitably brings upon the columns of even weekly journals, in the present instance excluding editorials and compelling columns already in type to lie over until another week, compels us to forego the critical notice which the event deserves, cutting this entire article down to limits which indeed bring it within the bonds of its stereotyped heading, "Dramatic Mention." Miss Clare's conception of "Camille" seems founded upon Miss Heron's interpretation, and she enjoyed the pleasure of being called before the curtain at the close of the second act and receiving, in company with Mrs. Saunders and Mr. Mayo, frequent applause during the progress of the piece. The advantage of being excellently supported was hers, Mrs. Saunders delighting the audience with an excellent "Prudence," Mrs. Perry acting spiritedly as "Nanine," while Miss Deaderick in a not very important part looked pretty enough to win any audience to good humor. Last evening Mrs. Leighton took a benefit, Mr. Wheatleigh volunteering for the occasion. Indeed, this seems to be a season of benefits, Mr. Frank Lawlor taking one at the Opera House on Wednesday evening of next week, previous to his departure for the Atlantic States. Mrs. Jordan gives her professional assistance on the occasion, and other excellent artists have rallied to the support of one who during the prosperous days of the establishment was "leading man" at the Metropolitan. Mr. Lawlor deserves a good house. There seems, indeed, to be rather of an exodus among the dramatic profession—an easy and natural transition perhaps from the genesis of late—as Mrs. Jordan, too, on the 13th of the coming month, will probably leave for the East, whither the remainder of the family has preceded her, the telegraph announcing the arrival in New York of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Thorne, senior, Mr. Charles Thorne, junior, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Thorne, and the widow of Thomas, who died in China. Mrs. Jordan will of course take a benefit before going, and if the city do not see that the benefit is worthy of the name, it will convict itself of neglect to decidedly the most beautiful woman that the California stage has produced. On Saturday afternoon and evening The Enchanted Forest; or The Bear, Eagle and Dolphin, a new scenic piece, will be brought out at the Opera House, Mr. Wheatleigh appearing—but whether as "Bear," "Eagle," or "Dolphin," we have not yet been informed. The announcement rather surprises us, as Mr. Wheatleigh is known to be morally and persistently opposed to the bare on the stage.

To-morrow evening, Maguire, at the Academy of Music, will treat the public to a grand vocal, sacred and instrumental concert, sacred concerts not being forbidden by the Sunday Law and Judge Shephard. The Bianchis are engaged for the occasion, together with Wanbold, Hill, the charming contralto, Miss Jennie Kempton, and other eminent artists.

Wilson's Hippodrome at the Mechanics' Fair Pavilion, has proved such a success that he will probably purchase the building, occupy it permanently, and allow no more Industrial Fairs to be held there. Such races—hurdle, steeple and all—were never seen before in San Francisco; the Bay View Park is envious and enraged, and Wilson and Williamson, in consequence, are not on speaking terms, notwithstanding the similarity of their names. A reference to our advertising columns will tell what is going on at the Hippodrome.

At the Eureka the company have been giving the usual variety of popular musical entertainments, with the farce of New Year's Calls, in which a laughable skating scene is introduced as the afterpiece. The whole stage is transformed into a skating-pond, and Coes, Birch, Backus, and others, mount the skates and create a deal of amusement, which culminates in Backus falling through a trap-door air-hole—a new way of giving himself hole-i-day airs; (the copyright of that joke we purchased from Barnes of the Call, who invented it expressly for the present gay and festive season.)

It will be remembered that the brilliant young writer, Fitz James O'Brien, was fatally wounded early in the war in West Virginia. He was taken to a house near the battle-field, and was tenderly cared for by its mistress until his death. O'Brien's mother, a wealthy Irish lady, who resides upon a charming estate on the banks of the Shannon, has recently sent to her son's last nurse a magnificent set of jewelry.

CLARA TO BELLA DONNA.

MY DEAR BELLA DONNA: You have no idea with what pleasure I read your charming letter in THE CALIFORNIAN of the 24th inst. It was the more welcome because it gave me glimpses of persons and things regarding which I have been so curious for a long time. Yet I am puzzled in my speculations as to the manner and circumstances of your admission to the penetralia of Club life. Were you really inside of that abode of bachelors, or did one of the brotherhood describe it to you? I do so long to see you and have a talk with you as to the persons you saw there, its interior arrangements, its routine and peculiarities. Men can be eager to be informed of the mysteries of a harem, while women are equally avid to learn all about clubs. A few days since a mutual friend of ours called to see me, and he exhibited to me and my sister some cartes de visite of the members. It appears that some one in China—whether Mongolian or Circassian, I can't really say—sent an immense punch-bowl as a present to the Club, on the receipt of which there was quite a jollification, and the bowl was baptized with appropriate rites and ceremonies. By way of reciprocity it was proposed to send to the East Indian an album containing the likenesses of the members, and it was a part of that collection I saw. One of them was your Rip Van Winkle. His age I cannot gather from the carte—much less is there anything in the living man to denote it. People say that one can, by the rings, get at the longevity of an oak, but if Rip bear any corresponding indications by which his age can be told, you must go lower than his face. They may call him old by the almanac or Gregorian calendar; yet his capacity for late hours and long drinks declare him to be the youngest of the club. I am told he is gentle as a woman, of delicate sensibilities, a cheerful bonhomme, and one of the fullest-hearted fellows in the world. I remember one other of the collection. It was of a beau I have frequently seen on Montgomery street, and I have also encountered him on the sea-beach, mounted on a slender, bright-eyed horse that perhaps I sinned in coveting. The rider was quite good-looking, and he wore the beard I so much admire—moustache and imperial. It's a great shame such persons don't get married. I really think clubs odious places and sadly demoralizing to young men. For my own part, I wish the Governor or Gen. McDowell would abate all such nuisances. Johnson says that clubs are "an assembly of good fellows meeting under certain conditions." What does he mean by "certain conditions?" Please answer this question.

I had nearly forgotten another likeness, that of a wee little morsel of a fellow whom some of the girls call "Le Petit Enfant." Unlike most little men, he carries his diminutiveness in all his surroundings—at least those of his own selection. He has a pair of ponies, and it seems to me his riding companions are always just his size. At the opera or theatre his lougette is of the smallest kind, and I doubt not all of his other appointments are in keeping. I called last week to see Sarah N—, and she told me that "Le Petit" was at the bal costumé, and that he wore a queer sort of dress; his pantalons having no legs. Sarah said he ought to be ashamed of himself—that such a costume was not decent. He must have looked droll, and I wish I could have seen him, so that I could have judged for myself—for between you and me, she is growing prudish. I am sure there is no harm, so long as his limbs were covered. People see worse things at a circus without making the slightest complaint. The truth is, Sarah is not as young as she was, and as people get old they begin to be queer. It seems to me that the life of a young and good-looking bachelor, rich, withal, is one of unmitigated selfishness. A man has no right to pass his life all alone with no object but his enjoyments. Celibacy in such instances as "Le Petit" is a denial and misapplication of Heaven's gifts. If such persons have a good time, to use brother Sam's phrase, the first half of their lives, I am sure they have misery and loneliness enough the other half. They get gouty, rheumatic and dyspeptic; they have nothing but hired attentions; they are served for profit and the opportunities for pilfering, instead of having the gentle and patient nursing of a devoted and loving wife, whose ministrations are kind and beautiful, because God has filled the female heart with such tender charities. Yet, my dear Bella Donna, our sex is in fault, and I think, from the defective system of our education, which restricts us to the acquisition of what are called accomplishments. Why not educate women to be the intellectual companions of men, so that they can be loved for something beyond a "pretty face?" Besides all this we must not forget that the cultivation of the mind is the cultivation of the heart, and that the higher you discipline a woman's head the more earnest, the more infinite you make her capacity for loving. If this were the rule in female education, separations, divorces and seductions would be the exceptions.

But where does my imagination carry me? In my letters to you, dear Bella Donna, I place no restrictions on myself, I simply daguerre the feelings which at the time possess me.

I have seen it stated that "An Art Union" is to be established among us. What a charming place it will be, to be sure, for a morning's lounge if fitted up becomingly. People will go there, for everybody affects art, and one likes to be accepted as a patron, or at least as one of the cognoscenti. Rochefoucauld truly says that "men more easily renounce their interests than their tastes." With me painting and statuary, especially the former, stir a feeling of worship that no other material things can do. In cathedrals, those paintings which portray the Holy Mother, and which dimly open to us the "beatitude past utterance," affect me beyond expression. It has been said that

"True painting emulates the poet's lays," and yet I think the effect of a painting is more real and lasting than that produced by a poem. The first has expressions and influences that poetry can not excite, it is more ideographic—it is indeed poetry incarnated. I have often wondered that woman with her delicate perception, her tender sensibilities and passionate nature has not taken a higher position in the domain of art. What she can do is well illustrated by the achievements of Rosa Bonheur, and her distinction has been acquired in the most difficult branch of art.

I remember that when "pa" took me to Pompeii, while he loitered near the house of Diomed, I went on to the place where the tomb of an Adile stands. That tomb, let me say in parenthesis is full of beauty, that beauty which attaches to a pure symbol. It represents a ship which has encountered heavy storms, and is just entering port with torn and tattered sails. Isn't that an exquisite type of rest—of heaven? Near there I saw a woman seated on a camp stool, and in her lap was a small sketching easel. As I came near her, with a charm of manner that powerfully attracted me, she spoke to me in French and kindly offered to show me the drawing she had made. It was, to use her own language, merely an esquisse. Yet in its imperfect and crude state it developed rare talent. Later, when I saw the well known portrait of Rosa Bonheur, painted by herself, in which she is represented as resting her hand on the head of a bull, I recognized my chance acquaintance at the tomb of the Adile.

But as it is getting late I must say good night. Write soon. m'amie. CLARA.

OUR NEW YORK LETTER.

[FROM THE CALIFORNIAN'S LADY CORRESPONDENT.]

NEW YORK, November 23, 1864.

ARTEMUS WARD, having lectured before all the crowned heads of Europe ever thought of lecturing, now clears $300 a night at Dodworth's Hall by his show, Artemus survives all his brother humorists. Doesticks, in that capacity, became extinct long since. He may now be seen as a medical student, wearing a Scotch cap and a serious face. Orpheus C. Kerr appears to be obliterated from the ranks of Wit and Humor as decidedly. He is plain Mr. Newell at present, in his New York home, and not the companion of her of whom the London theatricals speak as a female horse-rider. Poor Squibb, the best of them all, is dead. "Alas, poor Yorick! Where be your gibes now? your gambols? your songs? your flashes of merriment that were wont to set the table in a roar?" I saw them a few months since, arranged, either by himself or by some friend after his death, for publication. They have not appeared, and I do not know whether the publisher to whom they were offered, accepted them. His pen and ink sketches were clever, his wit was fine and pungent, his sense of burlesque excellent, and he deserves to live. Artemus Ward is merely funny and absurd. Over his fun and absurdities he is as laborious as if he were writing a metaphysical treatise. That which sparkles in print and from his mouth, was dug out of his brain with slow patience. So it would seem that humor is capable of being composed, or invented, and that it is not always spontaneous. Hood is the king of jesters; his mind was a complete circle which contained the tears of wit as well as its laughter and sarcasm.

There are a good many shows now. One of them is a dog and monkey show. These animals are trained to represent the weak side of human nature, and as human nature has a ludicrous perception of its own weakness it laughs very much over the performances of the dogs and monkeys. There's the show of Zenobia, also, "as she appeared in the Triumphal Procession of the Emperor Aurelian at Rome." The artist, Miss Hosmer, has probably hit the secret of making her work a popular one, in the ornaments with which the statue is decorated, and its dress. The exquisitely cut chain which binds the arms, the carved sandals, the elaborate bas-relief ornament on the girdle, the jewelled tiara, the weighty, voluminous robes, cannot fail to please the ignorant eye. But these matters will not conceal from the artist's eye the fact that Zenobia's neck appears rather larger than her face, and that it has no curve at all, but is a junk of marble. The part of the head just behind the tiara rises up like a lump; its height from the lobe of the ear is too great; possibly the officers who guarded the royal prisoner struck her on the crown for not keeping up in the procession, and raised a bump. I am not able, so far, to add my testimony to the archives of the strong-minded conventions in favor of the superiority of my sex in sculpture. Miss Hosmer has done a great deal, though, and success and honor be to her! The Artist's Fund Exhibition is on hand at present; from the merit of the pictures it would seem that the artists are indifferent somewhat about helping themselves to a comfortable security in old age. Goupil has a show of Hart's new picture, Woods in Autumn, and a late work by Gerome. Barnum, if he may be believed, stimulated by the immense success of the Museum, is filling it up with new dwarfs, giants and other creeping things. He addresses the public with remarkable faith in its gullibility, in a letter which contains a vague programme of wonders. The strougest show at the Museum is its Smell. Mr. Owens has at last retired from his wonderful performance of "Solon Shingle." His characterization of the stage Yankee is the best thing of the sort I ever saw—a most remarkable bit of unclean, low art. Oweus, pictorially speaking, must be ranked with Gerard Dow and Hogarth. Mr. John Clark gives up "Major de Bootes," and his brother-in-law, Edwin Booth, dons the sock and buskin in tragedy. The Winter Garden is leased by Clark & Booth, and we may expect stationary stars from this fact. Possibly Junius Brutus Booth and John Wilkes Booth may attempt to star it on the family boards, though, unlike Edwin, they do not inherit the family genius. We have much opera at present. A large herd of foreign and native prima donne is enclosed in Maretzek's bars. There is no end of tenors also, who, like the Aztec children, always need propping in the legs. Bassos have a formidable base generally, but tenors rarely have any pins to speak of. Miss Morensi, (real name Duckworth,) an English-American, is our best debutante. She is handsome, has a sense of the dramatic, and possesses a "large," rich contralto voice. Mrs. Van Zandt, soprano, made her first appearance as "Gilda" in the opera of Rigoletto. She sang high, long, and well, but trusted to her voice alone, and gave all stage business the go-by. Her arms were stiff, her legs refused to act like human legs, and her eyes rolled to the right and left in dread of the baritone man, the tenor man, and the chorus. Miss Harris, who should have been the daughter of Sairey Gamp's friend, "which it is Mrs. Harris," and invisible like her mother, appeared in Lucia di Lammermoor. She sang feebly, acted feebly, and was to be commiserated, though many bouquets were thrown at her, and a wonderful basket of flowers passed up through the orchestra. Miss Kellogg, who may be called a veteran in comparison with these nonage singers, is always finished, refined and graceful, though never great. She appears to excellent advantage in Faust. Her dress is an acceptable copy of the costume of the period; her dark hair is beautifully braided and powdered to a golden hue, and in manner, at least, she conveys the sentiment which belongs to "Margaret." But, although I have heard the opera of Faust over and over again, and although it is exceedingly popular, I cannot make its music express the circle of human passion, desire, fruition, misery, which Goethe's great drama rounds. Music is capable of describing the emotions, the tumults, the torments, and disappointments of the soul, and so I think Faust fails. To prove my idea, it is certain that the celebrated march is the favorite point in the opera; its music is hard and perfectly material, so marked in accent, and so metallic, that a child could beat it out on a tin kettle. It is spirited and exhilarating, I grant, but it is a bit apart from the sense of the scene. It is splendidly played by the band of the 6th U. S. Infantry, who are hired to come up from Governor's Island on the nights of the opera. They march, the players, like regulars, crossing and re-crossing the stage, and that is one reason I am sure of the invariable encore. The Italian singer Zucchi, is a glorious actress, as fine as decaying Grisi was when she brought the remnants of her superb self to New York. Zucchi's acting in Il Poltuto is magnificent; there is a storm of power and passion in every motion, every expression, but her voice is loose, and not particularly sweet. I fancy she is aged behind her rouge and powder, but no matter for that, she is the only artist we have had for a long time. Speaking of the stage brings to mind Doran's new book, Annals of the English Stage, from Thomas Betterton to Edmund Kean—Actors, Authors, Audiences. The book is in two volumes, and very handsomely printed by Widdleton. All the personal gossip concerning the famous actresses and actors whose names we are familiar with, Dr. Doran has collected and arranged in his happy style. As a history it is exhaustive, and for interest equals a novel. For quoting purposes it would last a newspaper writer years. Here is one picked up at hazard, as one opens the Bible to find a text applicable to one's hopes: "Tate Wilkinson himself once, at Maidstone," on a benefit night, "vetted only two pieces of candle and eighteen pence. This theatre was so near the river that the tide overflowed the pit, and threatened to float away the house." Plums of this sort are thick on every page.

The Christmas books are coming in; that is the publishers are sending them to the newspapers for notice. My closet shelves already number some fifty, mostly books for little folk. I propose to give a list of them in my next. Somebody, it appears, reads THE CALIFORNIAN in New York. Last Saturday's Leader copies "Salt Sea Guerrilla."

I am happy to learn that THE CALIFORNIAN keeps a "poet."

In this part of the world poets do not flourish—poems do not pay. Bryant lost several hundred dollars on his last volume, Thirty Poems. If he loses, who shouldn't? The Bitter Sweet poet, Dr. Holland, makes money, however; motherwort and brown sugar are understood by the multitude. Speaking of motherwort reminds me that even our weeds are washed away with our continual showers. Somebody says the California rainy season is imported here. I hope the Washoe mines will follow it. SOCIAL CHAT.

I RECOLLECT well the first sentence in the old Greek Grammar from which I derived the rudiments of the noble language of Homer and Demosthenes—"Man is a social being." He is, indeed, the only talking animal and the only laughing animal, unless we except the hyena, whose laugh can hardly be attributed to any mirthful propensity. Mankind, alone, of all the animals which came out of Noah's Ark, indulges in chat, though I but anticipate the rather questionable joke which you are ready to make when I admit that many birds do more, for they chat-ter. If you would be guilty of so poor a joke as that, you would doubtless say, apropos of Noah, that the rainbow, having been first discovered by him, should be called his Arc. Or you might say that the people of his time were not skilled in rowing and boating exercise, for, though they laughed and scoffed, they could not "thwart a N-oah."

I think we are all agreed that a social chat is more entertaining than a long prosy lecture or essay. The two styles are totally different. For example, when I wrote my famous essay for the North American Review, on "The Utilization of Mongolian Crows," it was my endeavor to treat of the subject from a comparatively anatomical, naturally historical, and politically economical point of view. My readers were undoubtedly forcibly impressed with the gravity of the subject, and my essay would, doubtless, have been rejected had I dared to suggest that the crows were of more value than greenbacks, because they were good for Cawin'. I was forced to stick closely to the subject, though I divided it into three chief heads, with half a dozen sections under each head. But if I sit down to have a little chat with you we are fettered to no particular subject. One idea succeeds another with such rapidity and slight connection that in a half hour we have discussed the latest fashions, the sermon last Sunday, the advance of Sherman, the President's message and the rise of the streams in the interior. Speaking of high water, I think Judge Shephard is alone responsible for this result, for I notice by the papers that he recently made an order to "send up" Rivers. There was something said about a grand lareeny, and I am told that Rivers carried away two bridges and a wing-dam! But the administration of justice has already been a theme for mirth to the readers of THE CALIFORNIAN, and as it may furnish, at some future time, a long chapter of "chat, chat," I will not touch upon it at present.

I have often been amused by noticing the signs conspicuously displayed in our streets. Our good San Francisco people seem to have run largely to this style of literature, and some specimens are decidedly unique. Any one who had occasion to go to the post-office a few weeks ago must have noticed the announcement of "Danderlion Candy" for sale. I think the painter must have intended, at first, to paint the "lion" only, but, for some unexplained reason, got his "dander" up afterwards. Among our Chinese stores I have seen the apostrophe "Oh, Sing," doubtless intended as a direct quotation from the Psalms. Persons desiring an inexpensive trip to the ocean will find a "C. Beach" within a block of the Occidental Hotel. The sewing machine stores come out strong in the matter of signs, and one would think, to see the placards on their windows, that the sewing machine would soon be employed to do all of our work. Our agricultural friends are perhaps not aware that much of the hardest labor of farming can be performed by this useful invention. In cleaning up timber land, being an unusually lively "feller," it can be used to advantage for felling trees. In the spring time it will "sew" the fields, and in harvest time it will "gather" and "bind." Being famed for its "running" it will make quick work with all troublesome "bastes." Really, what need 'll there be for further invention when we have already such a n-eye approach to perfection?

Coming down Third street the other day, I stumbled over a huge section of iron pipe before I got my eye on it. I was told that this was to be used by the new gas company. This set me to thinking of the improvements, in the last fifty years, in the matter of lighting up. Our grandfathers, in the good old days of big fire-places and cheap fuel depended, to a great extent, on fire light; but after reading by the light of a pine wood knot who would not pine for something better? Hundreds of staunch vessels, manned by sturdy whale-slayers, left our New England ports, and the result of their labors was a revolution in the methods of producing light. The thing was then done according to H-oyle, and people were in a sorry plight who could not afford lam-plight. Next came gas, which, from its great buoyancy, was long considered the lightest thing out, but if you will just take the trouble to go to the city front you can at any time see a lighter. In every department of science and literature we have witnessed great advances during the past quarter of a century, and I propose, perhaps in my next, to refer to some of them which I have not time nor space to touch upon at present. P. GREEN.

SAXON HAIR-DOCTORS.

"YOUR hair is getting very thin on the top, sir. You'd find it very advantageous to use our Treble X Cytherean Extract, which will entirely remove the dandruff, and cause the short hairs to grow long. You will also derive great benefit from our Medicated Balm of Paphos, which is of unparalleled efficacy in moistening dry heads of hair." So says the modern hair-dresser, who generally has some wonderful theory about the causes of baldness. We met with one who attributed it entirely to "the acids," which his "Arabian Alkali" would effectually neutralize. Unfortunately, this ingenious gentleman broke down in the cross-examination, proved himself to have a very vague idea of the nature of acids in general, and was utterly unable to explain what were the particular acids that destroyed the hair. Nevertheless, we bought a bottle of the "Arabian Alkali," with the view of making experiments. Two strips of litmus-paper bore evidence, firstly, that the alkali was not alkaline; and secondly, that it was not acid. In short, it was merely colored and scented water, which probably has a beneficial effect when applied to dirty heads. Another of the fraternity advocated the cutting cure, probably because the public has become somewhat sceptical about oils and washes. He, too, had a theory: it was a mistake, he said, to suppose that when the hair fell it came out by the roots; nothing of the kind; it broke off in the middle, and split up towards the root, and if not cut, a hair thus unfortunately divided against itself, left only to itself above the surface of the skin, this strip had, to the naked eye, the appearance of a fine but perfect hair. Miserable delusion! it was only a remnant, which might, by the constant use of the scissors, be induced to become a perfect hair. The application of the theory was not difficult. In the first place, you ought to have your hair cut regularly once a week; in the second place, this cutting operation ought to be performed by the author of the theory, who alone knew how to turn a strip into a cylinder.

Sometimes, too, in a moment of weakness, a family doctor may be induced to prescribe for falling hair. He does it cautiously. "Mind," he says, "I don't say it will be effectual in your case, but it is undoubtedly the best thing known for making the hair grow. Last year I had three young ladies under my care, who were terribly frightened about their hair, and it's now thicker than ever." You cannot fail to have faith after this, especially seeing that the doctor himself is bald, so you apply the remedy (tincture of cantharides and acetic acid, most probably,) which, if it does not turn your hair grey, proves as effectual as any of the other remedies.

But it seems that in all times ladies and gentlemen losing their hair believed in the possibility of a remedy, and where there was a demand there was, of course, a supply. The Ediths and Rowenas of the Saxons consulted their doctors about their hair, and so did the Julias and Emilias of the Romans before them. The treatment was rather different in those days, but probably not less successful than that of our time. We may doubt whether the Lady Rowena put her hair in curl-papers; we may be sure she went to bed with her nose full of sowbread, serenely confident that she knew how to keep her hair on her head. "In case that a man's hair fall off, take this same wort (sowbread,) and put it into the nostrils," says Apuleius. He adds soon afterwards: "It also is well beneficial for heart-ache;" possibly he might have said, with equal truth, for "the thousand natural ills that flesh is heir to." But, in any case, it is no small thing to know how your hair may be made to grow, and your heart cured of its aches, by one and the same remedy.

But not content with acting upon the hair indirectly through the olfactory nerves and brain, Apuleius and the Saxon leeches occasionally recommend local applications. They mention especially water-wort. "If a man's hair fall off," they say, "take this same wort, pound it in oil, smear then the hair therewith, it soon cometh fast." The assertion is rather vague as regards time, especially when we consider that the Saxons were a patient people. We are more precise in these days: "A month's trial will suffice to convince the most sceptical of the infallible virtues of the Pommade Philocombe;" and "we need ask the afflicted to buy no more than one hottle of the oil of the Esquimaux chiefs."

Again, we read of hop-trefoil: "Also this wort is efficacious to make either men's or women's hair grow." On reading this, one might have a horrible suspicion that, unless the fact is specially mentioned, the prescription which will make man's hair grow will not necessarily make a woman's hair grow. One can hardly suppose that even mediæval leeches would be so selfish, so wanting in consideration to the sex, as to study the art of restoring their own hair and that of their male friends, while they were careless about the hair of their sisters and their sweet-hearts, to whom an unimpaired head of hair was of infinitely greater importance. Fortunately, we have succeeded in obtaining evidence on this point from an old Saxon chronicler not very well known either to the public or to professed antiquaries. The watercress remedy prescribed by Apuleius, is mentioned in this old Saxon chronicler in such a way as to leave no doubt that where any mode of treatment was recommended for a man's hair, a woman's hair was included. "In case that a man's hair fell off," says Apuleius again, "take juice of the wort which one nameth nasturtium (nasturtium officinale), and another nameth cress; put it on the nose; the hair shall wax" (grow.) It is worth while to remark, that in the case of this remedy, as well as of sowbread, the action seems to be indirect. There are, doubtless, people in existence who would laugh at the idea of applying to the nose an herb intended to act upon the hair. But it must be remembered that cerebral disturbance has a very powerful effect upon the hair, sometimes turning it white in a single night, as in the (doubtful) case of the Prisoner of Chillon, at other times causing bare patches upon the head, which, if not looked to in time, lead eventually to total baldness. It seems, therefore, most reasonable to suppose that any action upon the brain might be expected to have an effect upon the hair. Through the orifices of the nose an effect may be produced upon the olfactory nerves, which would immediately stimulate the brain and probably make the hair grow. The experiment is really worth trying.

To return, however, to the proof from the Saxon chronicler, that women are included when men are spoken of, Niewand* tells the following story:

The Lady Rowena feared much that her lovely locks of flaxen hair were falling and becoming thin. When next she saw her father confessor, she said unto him, having first talked of many other things, "Father, my mind much misgives me that my beauty is about to depart from me."

"How so, my daughter?" said the confessor; "methinks thy mind is not set upon heavenly things, as it should be."

"Father, have I not confessed unto thee, and answered all thy questions; and can I forget thy skill in leechcraft, and in all knowledge? Oh, father, tell me what must I do to save my hair, thou who knowest a remedy for all things."

"There is a remedy for that, as for all other ills; thou hast but to apply it, and thy hair is saved."

"Tell me, tell me, father, what is it!" she cried, and her blue eyes danced with pleasure and with expectation.

"It is simple and it is sure," said the confessor; "thou knowest the wort called cress, or, as others name it, watercress?"

"I do," answered the Lady Rowena; "I like it much, both with butter and with cheese."

"Good!" said the father. "Thou shalt take thereof, at even, ere thou liest down to rest, and shalt rub thereof upon thy nose, first with thy right hand and then with thy left hand, and when both hands are weary, then shalt thou call unto thy tiring-woman, and she also shall rub upon thy nose. Thus shalt thou do every night."

"Oh!" said the Lady Rowena, very slowly.

"Thou likest not the remedy?" asked the confessor.

"But——" began the Lady Rowena, and stopped short.

"Say on, my daughter."

"But, father dear, will not the rubbing of my nose cause a redness thereon, or peradventure tear the skin thereof?"

"I know not, my daughter; peradventure it may, but it will restore thy hair."

"Oh! what am I to do?" asked the Lady Rowena, in despair.

"What thou wilt," answered the confessor, sternly.

"But, father, if I do as thou biddest me, how soon will my hair be fast again?"

"I bid thee not; do what thou wilt; thy hair will be fast again when it shall please God."

Then the Lady Rowena began to weep, and threw herself at the father confessor's feet, and entreated him, saying,—

"O father, be kind unto me, for I am wretched."

And the confessor stooped down to raise her, and she put out her hand, and lo it came upon the crown of his head, and it was smooth like unto a billiard-ball. And the Lady Rowena was astonished, for she knew that, when hair has been shaved off, the skin is rough and unpleasant to the touch, and she said unto him,—

"Why, how is this, father confessor? I thought it was only the tonsure which made bare the crown of thy head, and lo thou art bald. Where are thy water-cresses, O father confessor?"

Then there was a redness in the confessor's face, as of a fire reflected therein, and he answered unto her, and laid his hand upon her head, and said unto her,—

"Fair daughter, the vanities of this world are naught unto me. God gave me my hair, and God hath taken it away again. But thou, wherefore dost thou repine? Thy hair is thick and fair to look upon. Fear God, and he good, and all shall be well with thee and with thy bright locks."

And the Lady Rowena went on her way rejoicing.

Do thou likewise, O reader, when hair-dressers would make thee nervous.

*About 1045, A. D. Date not ascertained with precision.

"Didn't you tell me, sir, that you could hold the plough?" said a farmer to a man, whom he had taken on trial. "Arrah be arsy now!" said Pat; "How can I hold it and two horses drawing it away from me. But give it to me in the barn, and I'll hold it with anybody."

LYING DIAMONDS.—M. Pasteur has placed under the eyes of his colleagues of the French Academy, a little flock of six insects from Mexico, which had great success from the curiosity which they inspired.

These insects are rather large—three centimetres long at least—of a chocolate brown color, and are pyrophorous, or at least, inciferous. They have, in effect, above their eyes, two sorts of luminous protuberance of great brilliancy, which make them resemble opals of the greatest purity. The effulgence shed in darkness by these organs, the nature and composition of which are not yet known, is sufficient, it appears, to admit of reading by its light. Under certain circumstances, the insect can, at will, disguise its light by means of a membrane which it draws over it.

The Mexican ladies use this beetle as an ornament. It is called Cucujo by the Spanish, which is easily understood on beholding it, for there are no precious stones to be compared for color, purity, and luminous lustre with the protuberances of this insect. This insect, once captured, becomes an object of the greatest care and solicitude. Inclosed in cages of very fine brass wire, the cucujos are fed on fragments of sugarcane, or leaves of maize, and bathed in pure water twice a day. This last precaution is indispensable to the preservation of their health. The bath replaces the morning and evening dew. The Mexican pyrophora, which live in considerable quantities in the environs of Vera Cruz, where the Indians take them by balancing coals heated to a white heat at the end of a stick, thus become real domestic animals. They deserve better than any other creature the title of ornamental. They are jewels, without need of using metaphor to give them that name.

To use them in dress, they are placed in the evening in little bags of light tulle, and then disposed, according to the taste of the wearer, upon the skirts of dresses, like diamonds, and mingled with artificial flowers and humming-bird's feathers. Ladies also place them in their hair by means of pins passed between the head of the insect and its corslet, an operation which is harmless to the insect, and as may be seen by any one who has played with the stag-beetle in childhood.

A BISHOP IN PURBUS.—We can not resist the temptation of relating the following anecdote of the Apostolic Bishop of New Zealand. He persuaded the Bishop of Newcastle to start with him from Sydney on a missionary cruise in his yacht to New Caledonia, the New Hebrides, Loyalty, and other islands in his then extensive diocese. Like ourselves they put in at the Bay of Islands. The Bishop of New Zealand wished to show his brother of Newcastle a little of the country, and for that purpose proposed to take him to a distant station on the other side of the river. The ground was soft and boggy, as we had found it, and the Bishop of Newcastle had never been accustomed to "rough it" in such a country as this. He could ride his fifty miles a day in his own diocese; but his hardly brother always walked, and besides there were no horses to be had here. Always neat and spruce in his dress, looking "as if he had just come out of a baidbox," and afraid like a cat to wet his feet, he picked his way most carefully and delicately, unlike his brother Bishop, who tramped on "through thick and through thin," till at last they came to the river side. The river was swollen with the heavy rain which had been pouring down in torrents for some days previously, and he of Newcastle looked awfully puzzled, wondering how they were to cross—neither bridge nor ford being visible in any direction. He was still further puzzled when he saw the Bishop of New Zealand, without a word, deliberately taking off shoes, leggings, stockings, and, last of all, his breeches. In reply to his brother Bishop's "whatever next?" he coolly collected his various articles of dress and stepped into the river up to his apron, calling out as he did so, "Now then, Newcastle, off with your breeks, and follow your leader!" There was no help for it, as there was no other means of crossing the river, and the good Bishop invariably refused to be carried across by any of his Maori suite, on the ground that it was not right to treat such noble fellows "like beasts of burden."

A MINISTER who had been reproving one of his elders for over-indulgence, observed a cow go down to a stream, take a drink, and then turn away. "There," said he to his offending elder, "is an example for you; the cow has quenched its thirst, and has retired." "Yes," replied the elder, "that is very true; but suppose another cow had come to the other side of the stream, and had said, 'Here's to you,' there's no saying how long they might have gone on."

LYNCHED BY THE LADIES.—A young man named Isaac Camp, who had played the gay Lothario quite extensively among the young girls at Deerfield, Michigan, greatly to the prejudice of good morals, was waited upon by a deputation of matrons of the village, recently, and fitted with a suit of feathers, tar serving the purpose of securing the feathery garments to his person. One young girl, a victim of the libertine, has been missing for some time.

ALLEN'S

LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERNATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

Medical men have attempted to explain what it is, but admit that they have not discovered its antidote. Dr. Goodale offers this simple definition of its character: It is a disorder which he DOES CURE and they DO NOT. This is the great fact which it imports the sufferer to know, and a single trial will establish it beyond a question. Price, $1. Sold by all Druggists.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REDUCTION and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of this avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

B. A. HENRICKSEN'S

PATENT CHIMNEY TOP.

THIS useful invention is confidently recommended in all cases where it is desirable to create a great draft.

ON STEAMSHIPS

Its use will dispense with the use of the blower and the tall smoke stack, as it causes the furnace to consume the smoke. It has been successfully used on steamers, in San Francisco. The proprietor has permission to refer to Chas. Minturn, Esq., as to its value on steamers.

FOUNDRIES AND MACHINE SHOPS,

And all works requiring a great heat will find it of immense benefit. Stephen Cuiverwell and Lyon & Co., Brewers, are now using it, and to them I refer.

ON SAILING VESSELS

It has been used to great advantage, where, on account of baffling winds, it is difficult to keep fire in the galley.

FOR SMOKY CHIMNEYS

It is a sure cure, and has been used on the Russ House and other first-class buildings in this city.

FOR VENTILATION,

It is unexcelled, and is recommended to architects and owners of buildings where ventilation is required.

FOR MINING PURPOSES

It is well adapted, thoroughly removing all foul air from shafts and tunnels.

The proprietor also refers to the following gentlemen, who have used it: Capt. Lassen, brig Crimea; Dr. Nuttall, Calhoun & Son, Printers; Edgerly & Wickman, Ship Chandlers; J. B. Quintan, builder; Philip Cadue, Esq.

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS.

THE telegraph man enjoyed the Christmas festivities and the good news that seasoned the Eastern dinners so well that he forgot his friends this side of the mountains, who were consequently left without a line of news to feel good, bad or indifferent over, for several successive days—and weary, dismal and drizzly days they were. The good people were badly sold by the bogus despatches of Saturday night; yet those endowed with sufficient faith to believe them, and persist in the belief, were not far wrong after all. Sherman, arrived at the sea-shore, performs most successfully the first act of his grand new war-piece. The succeeding ones, judging from the tone of the first, are bound to grow in brilliancy till the denouement in the last scene, when the world will probably witness a tableau exceeding in grandeur anything that has ever been heard of in the annals of war. Savannah fallen, Charleston must soon follow. And even now the Federal guns are thundering at the gates of Wilmington! It is scarcely possible that the rebels can hold out against such moral suasion. With all those strongholds on the coast in our possession—with every point worth holding in the interior (except Richmond) under the starry flag of the Union, how long will the Destructionists persist in their wild designs to destroy the Republic of America? The day of their trial is at hand. They will find out when too late that the might of the nation is only now expanding, and that the final blow will work a terrible death to the rebellion.

December 22.—Sherman, in his march through Georgia, is reported to have devastated 42 counties, captured 4,000 prisoners, 10,000 negroes, 1,500 horses and 30 pieces of artillery. He did not lose a gun. Our entire casualties were about 500 prisoners, (stragglers,) 300 to 400 killed and wounded, including those at Fort McAllister. There was not a serious battle during the whole march.

From Nashville, accounts place Thomas at Columbia. That portion of the rebel army which crossed the river proceeded southward. The remnant of Hood's army is stated to be in a deplorable condition, and utter extermination is probable.

Gen. McCook overtook the rebel Gen. Lyon at Ashbyville and routed him. Lyon was also attacked and routed at Hopinsville, Kentucky.

December 23.—Mullen's peace resolution in the rebel Congress was defeated by 41 to 20 votes.

The N. Y. Times' special despatch speaks of the rebel retreat from Franklin to Duck river as "begging" description. Hood told his corps commanders to get off the best way they could with their commands. The rebel loss during the campaign is 18,000 men, 58 cannon and 18 general officers. The Union loss at Franklin was 2,000, and before Nashville less than 4,000. Rebel loss: before Nashville and in the retreat, 3,000 killed and wounded, and 8,000 prisoners; at Franklin, 4,000 killed, 3,800 wounded and 1,000 prisoners.

December 24.—From Louisville a despatch estimates Lyon's forces at from 2,000 to 3,000 cavalry and six pieces of artillery. They struck the Louisville and Nashville railroad at Elizabethtown, and destroyed a few unimportant spans over Bacon creek, a small stream, then turned north, and threatened the important trestlework at Muldrough's hill. Lagrange's brigade, of McCook's division, was close upon Lyon's rear.

December 25.—Gen. Hoke's rebel division has left its position in front of the Army of the James and gone to the assistance of the defence of Wilmington.

A division of Union troops under the command of Palmer, occupied Bower Hill, eight miles east of Portsmouth, Va., for the purpose, it is supposed, of operating against Weldon.

Sherman is again making demonstrations in the Valley of the Shenandoah; Early sends out 4,000 cavalry to meet him, but he will possibly be too late to do much harm.

Gen. Sherman sent the following despatch to the President, on Christmas Day:

"I beg to present you with a Christmas gift—the city of Savannah, with 150 heavy guns, plenty of ammunition, and about 25,000 bales of cotton. SHERMAN."

Gen. Foster says: "I opened communication with the city of Savannah with my steamers to-day, taking up the torpedoes which we could see and passing safely over others. Arrangements are made to clear the channel of obstructions."

December 26.—The confirmatory intelligence of the fall of Savannah gives particulars in relation to the capture. Sherman invested the city on the 20th, and then demanded its surrender on pain of bombardment. Hardee postponed his reply, and on the same night secretly evacuated the place, having first destroyed the Navy Yard and rebel stores. Two iron-clads were sunk. In the haste of evacuation the rebel soldiery neglected to destroy 32,000 bales of cotton that were stored in the city; and consequently they fell into our hands. Four small steamers—one a gunboat—were captured. Hardee and his troops crossed the river to the north bank, and were supposed to be pushing for Charleston. Next day, Sherman entered the city at the head of his body guard, and received from the hands of a deputation of citizens, the surrender of Savannah.

December 27.—Sherman moved up the Savannah river towards Augusta. His intention is to capture that place and then swing round his army in the rear of Charleston and destroy all its railroads on the way.

Thomas is still pursuing Hood. The latest news leaves the broken and disorganized forces retreating rapidly towards the Tennessee river, without making a stand. Hood is without artillery or pontoons, and the supposition is that as he cannot do much in the fighting line he must surrender.

Wilmington is closely besieged; 5,000 colored troops landed a few miles below Fort Fisher, and took a strong earthwork in front of the fort; but the rebels were reinforced and retook the work, driving the troops out with heavy loss. Other operations were successful, and the bombardment still goes on.

A brigade of Kilpatrick's cavalry is reported to have left Fort McAllister, on the 18th, for the purpose of releasing the prisoners on the Gulf railroad, 90 miles distant. All the Union prisoners from Millen are reported to be sent there.

December 28.—Richmond papers report the capture of Saltville, Southwestern Virginia, by Burbridge's division under Stoneman. The valuable salt works and lead mines which supplied nearly the whole of the Confederacy, were situated there. Everything was destroyed. Bristol and Wythville are also in ruins, and the amount of property destroyed by this raid is estimated at $20,000,000. Later official accounts confirm the news. Breckinridge is utterly defeated, and has retired into North Carolina. After completely demolishing the lead mines and salt works, Burbridge has arrived with his command safely at Cattleburg, Ky.

A cavalry expedition under Torbett, advanced towards Gordonsville. At Liberty Mills the rebels were defeated in a skirmish. Finding Gordonsville strongly defended by reinforcements, the Union troops retired.

LOCAL MATTERS OF THE WEEK.

The case of D. O. McCarthy, charged with libel, has been continued in the Police Court till next Tuesday.

JUDGE SHEPHERD sent John McLaughlin before the County Court, last Monday, for breaking John Peasey's nose with a sledge hammer.

D. S. WARE, balladist at the Eureka Theatre, was seriously injured by being thrown from a buggy on Montgomery street, opposite the Occidental Hotel, Tuesday evening. His head was badly cut in two places, and his ankle sprained.

A PRISONER in the County Jail named George Angle, under arrest for burglary, attempted suicide, Wednesday night, by hanging himself with a leather belt. Medical aid restored him to life, but he is now a raving maniac.

On Saturday afternoon the Provost-Marshal went out to Hayes' Park and arrested Michael Hayes on a charge of fitting out a Confederate privateer in this port. The prisoner underwent a preliminary examination before the military authorities, and was then conveyed to Alcatraz. Mr. Hayes is an old resident, and has many warm personal friends in the community who will be filled with regret if he has indeed been guilty of any such foolish and criminal proceeding.

Among the passengers by the Constitution, last Monday, were Gen. H. M. Naglee and formerly Surveyor-General Edward F. Beale. It was rumored on the authority of the Washington correspondent of the Sacramento Union, that Gen. Naglee came to California determined to send a cartel to Gen. McDowell, on account of the strictures passed by the latter upon Gen. McClellan in a speech delivered during the late campaign. We are unable to find any foundation for the report, however, and certainly, so far as appearances go, the two generals are upon friendly terms with each other. It is wonderful how canards are born, and how fast and far they fly.

On Monday evening last, during the progress of the Christmas pantomime at the Metropolitan Theatre, an accident occurred, to the manager and gymnast, H. C. Lee, who had ascended to the top of the fly, preparatory to being apparently blown from a mortar, when the machinery on which he was standing gave way, and he fell to the stage, fracturing his right ankle, and jarring him so severely as to cause at first serious apprehension of a fatal result. The audience was at once dismissed, as it was impossible to go on with the play.

JAMES GORDON, mate of a schooner, had been missing for several days. On Tuesday evening some little girls discovered his body immediately beneath one of the "man-traps" on East street, between Washington and Jackson. The right arm of the corpse was pointed upwards, and its position in the water showed that the unfortunate man must have fallen into the Bay at high tide and drowned while held fast by the feet in the mud at the bottom. Doubtless an extraordinary low tide would discover a forest of skeletons of missing men in the same position, victims to the neglect of property-owners along the city front. Will they never mend their ways?

On Saturday night last the people of San Francisco were most egregiously sold by the publication of a bogus Extra, announcing that "Richmond had been taken—Gen. Butler killed by a woman—22,000 men killed—that gold was down to 84," etc., etc. It being Christmas Eve, everybody and his wife were on the street, and the young scapegraces who peddled the "extras" reaped quite a harvest before the sell was discovered. Soon after this latter event about a dozen of the newsboys discovered a "cell" in the station-house. Some shadow of excuse may lie with the boys, who adopted an expedient which lay in their hands for raising pocket-money for Christmas, but the men who originated the swindle deserve punishment.

On Monday last, in broad daylight, a man attacked and seriously injured John P. Smith, formerly a conductor on one of the Omnibus Railroad cars, on Montgomery street, opposite the Metropolitan Theatre. It is reported that Smith was instrumental in causing the arrest of a party of gamblers, recently. The story goes that he made an application to them for a "loan," which he effected; but that a second application, accompanied by a threat of exposure unless the demand were complied with, did not prove successful; that in consequence he denounced them to the police, and that the "sporting fraternity" took this method of getting even—Mr. Smith's head was badly bruised.

SQUARZA, the inventor of punches, and the appreciator of the benefits of advertising, sends the CALIFORNIAN office a half-dozen bottles of his punch. The names are novel; we have never wrung tears from ladies' eyes, neither have we ever drunk them, but the latter experience will now be ours, for one of the bottles is labelled "Ladies' Tears." Then we have "Anti-Diverge Punch," "Matrimony-Promoting Punch," and every punch, in fact, except a punch in the head. That these punches, however, will go the head in due course of time, we shrewdly suspect. Squarza has our acknowledgments for his kind remembrance.

LAWRENCE & COMPANY'S
PATENT IMPROVED
Flesh Gloves and Straps!

For Producing a Healthy State of the System by Friction, Without the Risk of Tearing the Skin, as all the Ordinary Horse-Hair Gloves are liable to do.

THE GREAT VALUE OF THE HORSE-HAIR
Renovator as a therapeutic agent, when applied to the human body, is now too well known to every one who has paid the least attention to the importance of a healthy action of the Skin, to require further comment.

The superior advantages of the Patent Flesh Gloves and Straps, manufactured under this Patent, are that, by a peculiar process in the machinery employed in their manufacture, the points of the Hair are brought perpendicularly to the surface, thereby removing the liability to tear the Skin (a very general complaint against the ordinary kind,) and rendering them more pleasant to use, at the same time enabling the process of friction to be much more effectually performed; they are, indeed, a positive luxury to use, apart from their salutary effects.

The peculiar fabric manufactured expressly for the use of Ladies deserves their special attention; it has been highly recommended by the most eminent of the medical profession, and given universal satisfaction to those who have used it.

PHYSIOLOGICAL EFFECTS OF TOBACCO.

THE oft-discussed question as to the injurious effects or otherwise of narcotics upon the system was raised by Dr. Richardson, in a paper read recently before the British Association, and the whole subject was treated in a manner to which certain moderate smokers will not find fault, but which will be strongly opposed by Dean Close. He pointed out that the products of the combustion of tobacco are water, free carbon, ammonia, carbonic acid, an alkaloidal principle called nicotine, an empyreumatic substance, and a resinous, bitter extract. The water is in the form of vapor; the carbon in the form of minute particles, suspended through the water vapor, and giving to the eddies of smoke their blue color; the ammonia in the form of gas combined with carbonic acid; the carbonic acid gas partly free and partly in combination with ammonia. The nicotine is a non-volatile body, an alkaloid which remains in the pipe; the empyreumatic substance is a volatile body, having the nature of an ammonia, but the exact composition of which is as yet unknown; it is this that gives to the smoke its peculiar odor; it adheres very powerfully to woolen materials, and, in the concentrated form, is so obnoxious as almost to be intolerable. The bitter extract is a resinous substance, of dark color, and of intensely bitter taste. It is probably a compound body, having an alkaloid as its base. It is not volatile, and only leaves the pipe by being carried along the stem in the fluid form.

The greatest variations exist in various kinds of tobacco. Simple tobacco that has not undergone fermentation yields very little free carbon, much ammonia, much carbonic acid, little water, none, or the smallest possible trace of nicotine, a very small quantity of empyreumatic vapor, and an equally small quantity of bitter extract. Latakia tobacco yields these same products only. Bristol bird's-eye yields large quantities of ammonia, and very little nicotine. Turkish yields much ammonia. Shag tobacco yields all the products in abundance, and the same may be said of pure Havana cigars. Cavendish varies considerably; some specimens which are quickly dried are nearly as simple as Latakia; other specimens, which are moist, yield all the products in great abundance. Pigtail yields every product most abundantly.

The little Swiss cigars yield enormous quantities of ammonia, and Manillas yield very little. The water vapor is innocuous; the carbon settles on the mucous membrane, and irritates the throat. The carbonic acid is a narcotic, if it be received into the lungs. The ammonia causes dryness and biting of the mucous membrane of the throat, and increases the flow of saliva; absorbed into the blood it renders that fluid too thin, causing irregularity of the blood corpuscles; it also causes, when absorbed in large quantities, suppression of the biliary secretion and yellowness of skin; it quickens and then reduces the action of the heart, and, in young smokers, it produces nausea. The empyreumatic substance seems to be almost negative in its effects, but it gives to the tobacco smoke its peculiar taste, and it is this substance that makes the breath of confirmed smokers so unpleasant. Nicotine is scarcely ever imbibed by the cleanly smoker; it affects those only who smoke cigars by holding the cigar in the mouth, and those who smoke dirty pipes saturated with oily matter. Its effects, when absorbed, are very injurious; it causes palpitation, tremor, and irregular action of the heart; tremor and unsteadiness of the muscles generally, and great prostration. It does not, however, produce nausea or vomiting. The bitter extract is the cause of vomiting and nausea when it is absorbed; both it and the nicotine are always received into the mouth in solution, and produce their effects, either by direct absorption from the mouth, or by being imperceptibly swallowed and taken into the stomach.

Dr. Richardson pointed out that the greatest difference arises from the manner of smoking. Those who use clean long pipes of clay, feel only the effect of the gaseous bodies and the free carbon. Wooden pipes, and pipes with glass stems, are injurious. Cigars smoked to the end are most injurious of all. To be safe, a cigar ought to be cast aside as soon as it is half-smoked; and every cigar ought to be smoked from a porous tube. Cigars, indeed, are more injurious than any form of pipe, and the best pipe is, unquestionably, what is commonly called a "church-warden," or "long clay." After the clay pipe, the meerschauum is next wholesome. A pipe with a meerschauum bowl, an amber mouthpiece, and a clay stem, easily removable, or changeable for a half-penny, would be the beau-ideal of a healthy pipe.

All attempts to construct pipes so as to condense the oil have failed. To be effective they must be very large and inconvenient. It is of no slight importance, if a man must smoke, for him to be careful of the manner in which it is done. A man may, by practice, become habituated to a short foul pipe, but he never fails to suffer from his success in the end, and, unless the habit of actual stupefaction is acquired, no pleasurable advantage is derived. What may be called the soothing influence of tobacco is as well brought about by a clean, porous pipe, or well-made cigarette, as by any more violent and dangerous system, while the harm that is inflicted is of an evanescent character. He thus described the effects of immoderate smoking on the human system:

"In an adult man, who is tolerant of tobacco, moderate smoking, say to the extent of three clean pipes of the milder forms of pure tobacco in the twenty-four hours, does no great harm. It somewhat stops waste and soothes; but there are times when it unsettles the digestion; to an immoderate degree, say to six or eight pipes a day—especially if strong tobacco and fine pipes be used—smoking, unquestionably, is very injurious to the animal functions. On the heart the symptoms are very marked. They consist of palpitation, a sensation as though the heart were rising upwards, a feeling of breathlessness, and, in bad cases, of severe pain through the chest, and extending through the upper limbs. The action of the heart is intermittent, and faintness may be experienced. Extreme smoking is also very injurious to the organs of sense. In all inveterate, constant smokers, the pupils of the eye are dilated, owing to the absorption of nicotine, and the vision is impaired in strong light; but the symptoms which, most of all, affect the vision is the retention of images on the retina after the eye is withdrawn from them.

"Long smoking also affects the mucous membrane of the mouth, causing over-secretion from the glands, and a peculiar soreness of the throat, with enlargement of the tonsils, first well described by Dr. Gibb, and since named by myself, 'smokers' sore throat.' In some persons this irritation extends into the larynx, and bronchial tube, and the free carbon of the smoke is deposited there, giving a dark, almost jet, color to the secretion."

The very worst effects of moderate smoking were, the Doctor said, to be found in growing youths, upon whom tobacco was most deleterious and injurious. It had been urged that smoking produced cancer and consumption. Now, in regard to consumption, there had come under his notice cases to the total number of three hundred and sixty-one. Out of this total there were two hundred and twenty-five persons who did not smoke, and one hundred and thirty-six persons who did or had smoked. Thus out of three hundred and sixty-one consumptive persons, those who did not smoke showed an excess of eighty-nine. Out of the total of three hundred and sixty-one there were two hundred and thirty males and one hundred and thirty-one females. Out of the two hundred and thirty males the number who smoked was one hundred and thirty-six; the number who did not smoke was ninety-four. Thus, out of two hundred and thirty consumptive males, the smokers showed an excess of forty-two. In regard to chronic bronchitis, including asthma, there came under notice cases to the total number of four hundred and seventy-five. Out of this total there were three hundred and thirty-eight persons who did not smoke and one hundred and thirty-seven persons who did smoke or had smoked. Thus, out of four hundred and seventy-five persons suffering from chronic bronchitis, those who did not smoke showed an excess of two hundred and one. Out of the total of four hundred and seventy-five there were two hundred and forty-nine males and two hundred and twenty-five females. Out of the two hundred and forty-nine males the number who smoked was one hundred and thirty-seven, and the number who did not smoke was one hundred and twelve. Thus, out of two hundred and forty-nine males suffering from chronic bronchitis, the smokers showed an excess of twenty-five. He felt confident, therefore, that neither consumption nor bronchitis in the chronic form could be induced primarily by smoking; for while it is true that, amongst the men, those who smoked were the most numerous of the sufferers from both diseases, we are bound to accept this circumstance as coincidental merely.

The statements, to the effect that tobacco smoke causes specific diseases, such as insanity, epilepsy, St. Vitus' dance, apoplexy, organic diseases of the heart, cancer and consumption, and chronic bronchitis, have been made without any sufficient evidence or reference to facts; all such statements are devoid of truth, and can never accomplish the object which those who offer them have in view. As the human body is maintained alive and in full vigor by its capacity, within certain well-defined limits, to absorb and apply oxygen; as the process of oxidation is most active and most required in those periods of life when the structures of the body are attaining their full development; and, as tobacco smoke possesses the power of arresting such oxidation, the habit of smoking is most deleterious to youth, causing in them impairment of growth, premature manhood, and physical degradation.

A summary of the author's views was then given. He said if the views thus epitomized, in relation to the influence of tobacco smoking on individuals are true, we are led, without any difficulty, to the consideration of the influence exerted by the habit on communities and on nations.

That which smoking effects, either as a pleasure or a penalty on a man, it inflicts on any national representation of the same man; and, taking it all in all, stripping from the argument the puerilities and exaggerations of those who claim to be the professed antagonists of the practice, it is fair to say that, in the main, smoking is a luxury which any nation of natural habits would be better without. The luxury is not directly fatal to life, but its use conveys to the mind of the man who looks upon it calmly the unmistakable idea of physical degradation. I do not hesitate to say that if a community of youths of both sexes, whose progenitors were finely formed and powerful, were to be trained to the early practice of smoking, and if marriage were to be confined to the smokers, an apparently new and physically inferior race of men and women would be bred up. Of course, such an experiment is impossible as we live; for many of our fathers do not smoke, and scarcely any of our mothers, and thus, to the credit of our women chiefly, be it said, the integrity of the race is fairly preserved. With increasing knowledge we may hope that the same integrity will be further sustained; but still, the fact of what tobacco can do in its extreme action is not the less to be forgotten, for many evils are maintained because their full and worst effects are hidden from the sight.

The ground on which tobacco holds so firm a footing is, that of nearly every luxury it is the least injurious. It is innocuous as compared with alcohol; it does infinitely less harm than opium; it is in no sense worse than tea; and by the aid of high living, altogether contrasts most favorably. A thorough smoker may or may not be a hard drinker; but there is one thing he never is—a glutton; indeed, there is no cure for gluttony, and all its train of certain and fatal evils, like tobacco. In England, this cure has been effected wholesale. The friends of tobacco will add to these remarks, that their "friendly weed" is sometimes not only the least hurtful of luxuries, but the most reasonable. They will tell of the quiet which it brings to the overwrought body, and to the irritable and restless mind. Their error is transparent and universal; but universal error is practical, for, in their acceptance, tobacco is a remedy for evils that lie deeper than its own, and as a remedy it will hold its place until those are removed. The poor savage, from whom we derive tabac, found in the weed some solace to his yearning, vacuous mind, and killed wearisome, lingering time. The type of the savage, extant in modern civilized life, still vacuous and indolent, finds tabac the time killer; while the overworked man discovers in the same agent a quietus which his exhaustion having once tasted, rarely forgets, but asks for it again and again.

Thus, on two sides of human nature we see the source of the demand for tobacco, and until we can equalize labor, and remove the call for an artificial necessity of an artificial life, tobacco will hold its place with this credit to itself, that, bad as it is, it prevents the introduction of agents that would be infinitely worse.

A writer in the Spectator pronounces the following enlogium on bees: "The bees are an organized polity, a civilized community, differing from us no doubt more than Turks or Chinamen from Christians, but bound together by ties of language, experience, affection, common aims; in a word, all, perhaps even more than all, the ties wherewith we are bound together. Pray if the bees were our size and we theirs, what would they think of us? Our language they would describe as a hum; our finest flights of eloquence as a rather louder hum than usual; our music as comical chirping; our books as curious scraps of industry, to serve, as far as they could see, curiously base uses; our houses as showing a very incomplete sense of symmetry; our relations to one another as being almost incomprehensible; and excepting in the one cardinal fact that, with the exception of one or two varieties of the insect man, one male went with one female, all other relations as below the pains of a bee of the world to understand. Perhaps some poor eccentric bee might waste her precious life and die in a garret in the attempt to fathom the useless mystery of that pretty and curious little two-legged and two-headed insect, man; but the vocation of the public-minded bee would bid her attend to very much higher matters."

LAMB AND COLERIDGE.—Lamb once convulsed a company with an anecdote which, without doubt, he hatched in his fun-loving brain on his friend Coleridge. "I was," he said, "going from my house at Engfield to the East Indian House one morning, when I met Coleridge on his way to pop me a visit. He was brim full of some new idea, and, in spite of my assuring him that time was precious, he drew me within the gate of an unoccupied garden by the roadside, and there sheltered from observation by a bridge of evergreens, he took me by the button of my coat, and, closing his eyes, commenced an eloquent discourse, waving his right hand gently as the musical words flowed in an unbroken stream from his lips. I listened entranced; but the striking clock recalled me to a sense of duty. I saw it was of no use to attempt to break away; so taking advantage of his absorption in his subject, and, with my pen-knife, quietly severing my button from my coat, I decamped. Five hours afterward, in passing the same garden on my way home, I heard Coleridge's voice; and on looking in, there he was with closed eyes, the button in his fingers, and his right hand gracefully waving, just as when I left him. He had never missed me."

An Irish gardener, seeing a boy stealing some fruit, swore, if he caught him there again he'd lock him up in the ico-house, and warm his jacket.

CURE YOUR COLD!
SAVE YOUR LUNGS!
NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP
HAS CURED THOUSANDS!
—AND—
IT WILL CURE YOU!

"A Cough is generally the effect of a cold which has either been improperly treated or entirely neglected. When it proves obstinate, there is always reason to fear the consequences, as this shows a weak state of the lungs, and is often the forerunner of consumption."—Buchan's Domestic Medicine.

STOP THAT COUGHING!

Some of you can't, and we pity you. You have tried every remedy but two one destined by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure; but

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP!

It is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by its surprising curative powers.

WHAT KILLED HIM?

Dr. Hall, in his Journal of Health, speaking of the death of Washington Irving, asks the above question, and adds: "He might well have remained with us for some years to come had it not been for advice, kindly intended, no doubt, but given in thoughtlessness and reckless ignorance."

HE HAD A COLD!

Which, by some injudicious prescription, had been converted into Asthma." Let me say to Dr. Hall, that "prescription" was not

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP.

Keep it in the house—use it freely—give it to your children upon the slightest indication of a cold, and you will think and speak of it as all do who have become acquainted with its merits.

A THING OF BEAUTY
IS A JOY FOR EVER!

And the choicest attribute of beauty is a fine complexion. Oriental travellers note with rapture

THE DAZZLING BEAUTY

of complexion possessed by the Persian Ladies, and state that it is due solely to the use of a toilet preparation in great repute among them. The secret of this preparation has always been zealously guarded, but, by a singular chance, came into the possession of Mr. W. B. Champlin, who now offers it to the public under the name of

and invites attention to its rare merits.

IT WILL NOT INJURE THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL softens the roughest skin. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes all blemishes. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes tan and freckles. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL repairs the ravages of time and restores the pearly tint and roscate hue of youth. No lady should be without this invaluable beautifier.

THE BACHELOR'S DREAM EXPLAINED.

I think you remember that some months ago, I was courting a handsome young girl; Since then I went travelling up country, you know, And I've now lost the run of my Belle.

I loved her so dearly—I do love her yet, Of course she must know very well; Indeed, I am ready to go in a fit Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

I've made an inquiry of all the young chaps— Been searching at every hotel; I've now and then called on old Schiedam Schnapps Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

Kept running all day like a fool in the street, To search for another young girl; And every fine lady I chance for to meet, I've inquired for my old lover, Belle.

I start for a Photographic Gallery, To look for my sweet little Belle; And who in the name of you think I should see? A face of that very same girl!

I then said, "Dear Belle, I've caught you at last; Are you lying, or hero in disguise?" And what do you think, my friends, it was? A picture of her in life size.

Now to be seen at H. BUSH'S Gallery, corner of Post, Market and Montgomery streets, entrance opposite the Masonic Hall. oc29-3m

SOUND AND WHITE TEETH

Are Indispensable to Personal Attraction, and to Health and Longevity, by proper mastication of the food.

THIS UNIQUE PREPARATION IS OF INESTIMABLE value in preserving and beautifying the Teeth, strengthening the Gums, and in imparting a delicate fragrance to the breath. It eradicates tartar from the Teeth, removes spots of incipient decay, and polishes and preserves the enamel, to which it imparts a PEARL-LIKE WHITENESS.

Its anti-septic and anti-scorbutic properties exercises a highly beneficial and salutary influence; they arrest the further progress of the decay of Teeth, induce a healthy action of the Gums, and cause them to assume the brightness and color indicative of perfect soundness; while, by confirming their adhesion to the Teeth, they give unlimited enjoyment and fresh zest to appetite, by perpetuating effective and complete mastication. It speedily removes those ravages which children sustain in the teeth, owing to the improper use of sweet and acid substances.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FIFTEENTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

HENRY TOOMY, Plaintiff, vs. JAMES H. RAY, Defendant.—Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES H. RAY, Defendant:—You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the Service on you of this Summons —if served within this County; or, if served out of this County, within Forty Days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to recover in U. S. gold coin, the sum of $946, alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff upon a certain promissory note, and upon an account stated, as set forth and alleged in plaintiff's complaint, with interest on said sum of $946, at the rate of two per cent. per month, from May 25th, 1864, and costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will take judgment against you, payable in U. S. gold coin for said sum of $946, and interest as aforesaid, and costs.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 19th day of December, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

THINGS.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, January 7th, 1865.

IF the "5" in the date line be an awkward one, attribute it to the want of practice I've had with the figure; on the "4" of the year before I'm as perfect as twelve months' practice could make me.

Sitting here in my accustomed corner—from which I was crowded out last week by a bevy of Minnies and Matildas and Claras who all had something to say about balls—black-balling me, so to speak—I suppose I ought to indulge in a few grave reflections about the New Year and all that. If I refrain, attribute it not so much to pity for my readers as to the conviction gradually forced upon me, that I am too old to preach and have barely time left to practice the virtues which I should doubtlessly inculcate.

Over the Old Year that has just stepped out I have no jeremiad to utter, and for the New I have nothing beyond that polite bow and mild pressure of the hand with which it is always best to greet new acquaintances.

The Old Year owed me nothing, and if I didn't get even with it in that respect surely the fault was not my own; we got along very well together and were on tolerably good terms, for both of us knew that it was perfectly useless for either to attempt to get the slightest advantage of the other. He took three hundred and sixty-five days away from the score of my life, but I managed to equalize things by cheating him out from just that number of nights; he put me up to a few wrinkles during his administration, but I flatter myself that I showed him in turn some tricks he didn't know before; on the whole, it has been a pretty even race between us.

I do not much mourn for him, because I fancy he would not have mourned much for me had I chanced to die first. For a similar reason I erect no tablet to his memory; I could not conscientiously say much in his praise, and it is certain that if he had caused a record of good to be blazoned upon my headstone he would of necessity have stretched the truth strangely.

For not being more enthusiastic in greeting the New Year I have no apologies to make. Enthusiasm, the fault of youth, becomes the inexcusable folly of age. I have put out my hand with glad faith in forming new friendships and found speedy cause to draw it back again too often to be guilty of many ebullitions of fervor now. There was a time when I hailed each New Year's smiling face as the sure harbinger of all the Old Year had promised to bring me and failed, but I soon found out that one was no better than the other. And now I coolly wait to see whether the New Year will bring more than the Old Year took away, and to ascertain for a certainty whether it means to bring me anything at all, before I choose to make myself ridiculous by chanting its praises in advance and discounting hypothetical blessings.

To tell the truth, I am rather out of humor at having been crowded out of my corner last week by two balls to which I was not invited.

If I wished to be spiteful I could speak of wasteful extravagance anent the affairs referred to, and remark that the step from two balls to Three Balls is easy and rapid—that if people give such lavish pledges to the New Year, the old one may possibly see them giving pledges to a pawnbroker.

However, I will not be ill-natured, though it is very hard indeed to refrain from reflections on a ball which was given in a room wainscotted with mirrors. Again, I am rather shy of making mention of the Cosmopolitan affair, for meeting an acquaintance the next morning who attended—he went as the Duke's Motto, I believe—I asked him if he didn't feel sick after it and he replied, No; that the only ones who felt sick next day were those who were not invited.

If any desire a further account of what was said and done there or anywhere else let me refer them to the columns of that excellent and incorruptible sheet The News Letter, the only real and vigilant guardian of the public morals with which this coast is favored.

Beyond a few diamond pins and jewelled snuff-boxes bearing the trade mark of Tucker the holidays did not bring me much this year.

In place of a Christmas-box I found myself in a remarkably tight box, for the accumulated accounts of the year came pouring in, overwhelming me with a sense of indebtedness. The friends whom I had the misfortune to owe acknowledged in the premises that I was a pretty good fellow, but added that they couldn't let their bills lie over any longer.

Just as though I cared whether they lay over or under! Explaining to them my total indifference in the matter I also remarked that as the bills had already lain "over" one year it would probably afford them an agreeable change, as well as oblige me, to let them lie under for another.

While scoring up my indebtedness and counting over my Christmas presents, it suddenly occurs to me that I have forgotten to acknowledge a pair of stockings, received from "Sister Ruth, the Quaker widow," with an accompanying note wishing that they might help me "toe the mark." Sister Ruth has my thanks, not only for her present but also for her forbearance, for she might have multiplied the puns, adding the hope that they might heal my wounds, and so on to infinity.

Christmas, for the balance of my life, will be associated with Cannavan. I spent the day with him; to say that I mis-spent it would be to reflect upon a worthy gentleman as well as to convict myself of ingratitude.

Some one has remarked that there is nothing new under the sun. To that remark I take exception, and respectfully point to a new brand of champagne known as Napoleon's Cabinet.

Next to being in Napoleon's Cabinet, I cannot think of anything better than having Napoleon's Cabinet in you.

I scarcely think it can be called a dry wine, for my last recollections of it are as being a very wet one. And, by the way, what does a dry wine mean? If a wine were made of raisins instead of grapes, it seems to me that it might properly enough come under that head, but otherwise the phrase has no foundation in fact.

If any wine in the world could be called dry, our California wine would probably be a nearer approach to it than any other, for the reason that a man would needs be very dry before he'd drink it.

I haven't seen Cannavan since Christmas, and am doubtful whether any one else has. Unless he turns up during the coming week, I shall secure the Town Crier's services—or call in the help of the Morning Call.

My last recollections of my friend picture him seated in his Cabinet of Napoleon—

Bottles to the left of him,
Bottles to the right of him
Bottles all around him.

A rosy glow was upon his pensive but benevolent countenance, as he rubbed his hands together in the very ecstasy of good fellowship and remarked: Has not this been a glorious day, my friend,

INIGO?

THE FIRST FOOT OVER THE DOOR.

THERE is in bonnie Scotland,
That home of social cheer,
A curious old custom,
When the departing year
Turns back to take a last look
At the new one drawing near.

About some public cross-road
Gather the gay young folk,
And when the mighty town-clocks
Count the last midnight stroke,
Upon the stony causeway
A bottle of wine is broke.

Cheers for the blithe new-comer
A hundred throats prolong,
The year baptised in gladness,
With laughter, mirth and song,
And then in all directions
Scatter the canty throng.

All eager for their neighbors,
Through streets and highways fly;
To vanishing companions
A Happy New Year cry,
Each with a gay endeavor
To pass his comrades by.

For whichever friend sets first foot
O'er the threshold of a door,
First from the friendly goblet
Shall hearty wishes pour—
Is favorite with the household
Till the New Year's reign is o'er.

And, hearing of this quaint custom,
I thought of oftentimes
When over old hopes dying
Ring new hope's merry chimes—
When up the rounds of Fancy
Once more the spirit climbs.

When the heart in its young freedom
With love and trust is rife,
When the restless blood is throbbing
For the glory of the strife,
And it seems but a step o'er a threshold
To a new and perfect life.

Beyond this magic doorway
Some see a haughty name,
Some statues or poems or pictures
With laurels for every fame;
But the happiest ones see only
A hearthstone's cheerful flame.

No luxuries save the simple
Music and books are there,
And by the fire a lady
With a snow-drop in her hair,
And on the floor a baby
With wee feet white and bare.

I thought of feet grown weary
In Life's unending race,
Toiling for some vain-glory,
When all of love and grace
And happiness lives only
In one beloved face.

EMILIE LAWSON.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 7th, 1864.

SOME men keep savage dogs around their houses, so that the hungry poor who stop to "get a bite" may get it outside the door.

On most occasions the importance of calmness is in exact proportion to its difficulty.

THE LITTLE BOY THAT DIED.

I AM all alone in my chamber now,
And the midnight hour is near;
And the faggot's crack and the clock's dull tick
Are the only sounds I hear;
And over my soul, in its solitude,
Sweet feelings of sadness glide,
For my heart and my eyes are full when I think
Of the little boy that died.

I went one night to my father's house—
Went home to the dear ones all—
And softly I opened the garden gate,
And softly the door of the hall.
My mother came out to meet her son—
She kissed me and then she sighed,
And her head fell on my neck, and she wept
For the little boy that died.

We shall go home to our Father's house—
To our Father's house in the skies,
Where the hope of our souls shall have no blight,
Our love no broken ties.
We shall roam on the banks of the river of peace,
And bathe in its blissful tide;
And one of the joys of our life shall be
The little boy that died. [Dr. Chalmers.

THE TWO DREAMS.

BY ZAIDEE.

THREE years had passed since I promised to be the wife of Robert Hill. In all that time I had not seen him, but he had kept love well-fed by weekly allowances, coming to me by "sleight of hand," assisted by Uncle Sam's mail carrier. We were separated by miles of land and sea. Fortune did not smile on him, and I, like all women of a certain type, fancied I loved him better because unfortunate, without practically looking at his real self, to see why he did not master Fortune, instead of giving the surly dame the mastery over him. One day came a letter, asking me to share his lot, in that distant land, and the answer was given with many a joyful throb. I could find many good reasons why I should go to him; and though it was difficult to satisfy others, it was easy to make my own heart lie down in quiet peace. I was not strong, and, in that warmer climate, might find rosy, bounding health. I had, from childhood, been bewitched to travel, to look upon foreign lands, to study the great world at large. Here was a way opened, in which to take the first step towards the fulfilment of that desire. That new, strange country was a wider field for a young man to try what life could do for him. These were practical reasons—reasons I could freely speak of to influence those who had an interest in me. But down in my woman's heart was the stronger reason, that I would thus, by leaving all, father, mother, brother, sister, friends and acquaintances, show him how well I loved him—show him, beyond a doubt, that he was more to me than all the world beside. So the answer went, borne on the summer breezes, "I will come."

It was hard to bid farewell to the dear old home, to the loved ones there. For days I could but sigh, with something like a shudder, "It may be for years, and it may be forever!" Tears were in my heart, tears in my eyes, tears in my voice, and in the voices about me, all tears, and yet it was sweet sorrow, which a sight of Robert Hill's face would cast upon the winds. It was over at last, and only one—most loved of all except the dear old mother—was yet to say, "God bless my far off sister." It was the night before I left for New York, at Emelyn's home, that "I had a dream which was not all a dream."

The room was a familiar one, the large dining hall, in which was the great round table, and the arm chairs, which Jane had set firmly against the walls, making it look still larger and more empty. The Express Agent brought two packages to the door, addressed to me. They were from a foreign country, but there was no letter, no sign, by which I could ascertain from whom they came. They were placed upon the table, and Emelyn and I looked with intense curiosity at the great seals and foreign express marks, and talked and wondered, and wondered and talked about the strangeness of it all, before we thought to open them. And then our wonderment increased. There were two boxes, alike on the outside, and in some particulars alike in contents. In the first was a suit of bridal finery. There was the snowy satin robe, the fleecy veil, the orange wreath, the delicate satin slippers, the gloves, the pearls—nothing was wanting, and in delight, I imagined my Robert must have sent them. In the centre was another box, a curious box in form of a well defined Heart, made of rubies, with the word "Happiness" set in the top with pure white stones; I opened it and it was empty. "What does this mean?" said I, to Emelyn. "Look in the other, and it may enlighten you," replied she. In the second box was a complete suit of mourning, and the sombre dress, the hateful veil, and inky gloves lay folded around another ruby Heart, the counterpart of the first. I tried to unscrew the cover, but ere it was half-way off, I heard a ticking, then a hiss, and faint and trembling with a fear of something I knew not what, I laid it down.

Then Emelyn tried it, and was too weak with dread to take it off. Then we smiled, each at the other's foolishness, while all the time my heart grew colder and colder, and my lips shut tight together with a stifling word, very like "fear, fear," and Emelyn turned paler and paler. Then I seized the box with a desperate curiosity and wrenched off the cover, and out flew what I felt but could not see were spirits; yet what they were I could not tell, for they vanished as quickly as pebbles sink in the sea. Emelyn grew more pale and sad, but I grew firm and steady, and with relentless curiosity searched for a key that would open to my eager eyes this mystery. At last I found a paper on which was written, in words of fire, it seemed to me, so deeply did they burn into my soul, "This mourning suit you must now wear, for your 'happiness' has fled with the tiny spirits, and the bridal robes you will never wear till they are again gathered into the ruby Heart."

I awoke and thanked God that it was all a dream; but the morning sunshine did not drive it from me. It was still plain, and ever has been. Emelyn's earnest eyes asked me, on that last day of sweet, sisterly friendship, for a last view of my inmost self, and I granted it, even to the dream; and in tearful anxiety she said: "Dear sister, if you go to meet sorrow instead of joy, in that strange land, interpret aright your dream." Emelyn is naturally a little superstitious; I never was, and now—am only sure I have had two curious dreams. The last good-by was finally spoken, the last tear shed, and I was on the blue, blue sea, with a yearning look forward if by any effort I might sooner see the "Golden Gate" through which I must pass to meet my beloved, and rest, after the long, weary journey, upon a true heart that would always shelter me, always love me, always be to me whatever earth would hold of home and heaven.

Days rolled on; our good ship rolled on, also, till one beautiful moonlit night we stopped rolling, and I was with Robert Hill; and, so surely as life was coursing through my veins, my "happiness" had fled. I awoke from a three years' blissful dream of hope and love to find that dream gone out in nothingness—to find that I had set up in my heart an ideal king and called him Robert Hill. He, the Robert Hill sitting there in royal robes, satisfied me, but the man Robert Hill, came not near to me—could not enter the Holy of Holies where the ideal Robert reigned supreme—had no power within himself to command my heart to obey his calls for love and trust; so he left me, and my king, cast from his high throne, was killed by the fall. He was dead and cold, and must be laid in the dust, while still the seal of beauty was on his brow, I would not look on his face, when decay should disgust me. Oh! carefully I put back my sorrow, and tenderly buried him, and in his grave buried, also, all my beautiful dreams and my bright-winged hopes that had been so dear for three long years. I put on my mourning robes, and sitting down on that grave, took my heart out into my hand, and would have called it dead, it was so cold, had it not been for the exquisite throbs of anguish which still racked it and showed that life was there, though happiness had fled. Then I thought of my dream, and in misery I cried, "Who can find the spirits that make the life of my poor heart's 'happiness'?" I could hear no answer. The winds sighed, and a great black cloud was over my head, dropping tears to mingle with mine; so I gathered my gloomy robes about me, and went forth to do battle with the world alone, with a poor cold heart. * * *

One evening I met Finley Wade. Our souls talked. We met again and again. Last night I dreamed once more, and again I was in Emelyn's dining hall, and Finley Wade brought me the box of bridal finery, still unopened, and the ruby Heart was there, and with his own hand he gave it to me, and said, with such a smile that it made the room all bright, "My own love. I have gathered together all the spirits, and your 'Happiness' is in your 'Heart,' but I hold the key." And I was content, knowing that when he unlocked the "Heart" the bridal robes of joy and beauty should take the place of these worn and dusty garments.

Is this a prophetic vision? Does Finley Wade hold my heart's happiness? He has brought to me the beautiful spirit of Hope, with glory-tinged wings; and the spirit of Faith, whose steady eyes look unseared into the Future; and the spirit of Earnestness, climbing with a firm step to higher plains, to meet Duty and Right; and the spirit of Beauty, teaching me to recognize "God in all forms," and when he shall bring the spirit of Love, shall I not claim my "Happiness" at his hands? Will he not have gained the right to hold the key of my heart?

WITHIN the doors where love dwells no evil should enter: and the loving bride who would be the happy wife must specially guard against her own impatience and despair when the lover is merging into the husband, the flatterer into the friend.

THE persons most anxious to add to their wealth are generally those who don't know how to make any good use of what they have already.

KATERFELTO.

IN that graphic and well-known passage of the "Task" of Cowper, where the poet describes the varied contents of a newspaper of his day, the following lines occur:

"And Katerfelto, with his hair on end
At his own wonders, wandering for his bread."

The personage here alluded to was a distinguished juggler and quack doctor, who flourished in Britain at the close of last century. The name of Katerfelto, it is probable, was merely an assumed one, and certainly, if this was the case, the selection of it did credit to the magical professor's taste, as few names could be found more expressively appropriate to the character he bore. He took the title of Doctor—a German doctor—and combined the profession of legerdemain with that of the art medical. The Task was written about the years 1782 and 1783. At that time Dr. Katerfelto was vending his nostrums to the people of London, who had then the misfortune to sustain a severe and very general attack of influenza. The Doctor, of course, knew the full value of mystery, and used it freely to enhance his medical pretensions. If any one got better or got worse on his hands, it is to be suspected that the Doctor's remedies were innocent alike to the good and evil, and that the whole was attributable to the old principle, "Conceit can kill, and conceit can cure."

Katerfelto was one of the last specimens of a class that now live only in the pages of novelists—the race of travelling mountebanks, half quacks, half jugglers. In his journeys through England he was accompanied by his wife and daughter, two black attendants, and, though last, not least in importance, two or three black cats, usually termed Katerfelto's Devils. This goodly company were all packed together in a huge old coach or caravan, which contained, besides, the wizard's stock of apparatus. On reaching any town where it was thought fit to have an exhibition, the two sable (biped) assistants, dressed in antiquated green liveries with red collars, marched round the streets of the place, blowing trumpets, and expatiating on the wonderful powers and performances of Katerfelto and his cats. A portion of the doctor's exhibitions was really of a rational and creditable nature, consisting of magnetic, electrical, and chemical experiments, which he explained in a lively, humorous way. He was a good experimenter, and seldom failed in anything he tried. But amusement was the object of those who went to hear him, and in this they were not disappointed. His appearance was provocative of mirth, his long thin person being commonly enveloped in a tawdry, old-fashioned green gown, while his head was covered by a square velvet cap, making him altogether as like as possible to the pictures of the old stage-doctors, of whom he was the genuine successor and representative.

We have no account of the particular uses to which he turned his feline familiars. One thing is certain, however, that he had brought them to a surprising pitch of docility and apparent intelligence. Katerfelto seems to have flourished through a considerable part of the last quarter of the eighteenth century. Sometimes, like the most of his class, he lived in comparative ease and affluence, and, at other times, found himself caged in a jail, as a vagrant and imposter. Occasionally, his experiments brought him into scrapes. While stopping at a small town in Yorkshire, on one of his journeys, he set up a fire-balloon, to the great amazement of the rustics around. But, in a few days afterwards, the conjuror was arrested by order of a farmer, upon one of whose hay ricks the balloon had alighted, and by which it had been burned to the ground. Poor Katerfelto could not pay the damages demanded, and was obliged to go to prison.

It has been mentioned that the name of Katerfelto was probably an assumed one. The conjuror, however, seemed by his speech to be really a foreigner. Some have asserted him to be a Prussian soldier who had got his discharge. He is said to have died at Bristol about the beginning of the present century.

HOW TO ENTER UPON A SCIENTIFIC PURSUIT.—In entering upon any scientific pursuit, one of the student's first endeavors ought to be to prepare the mind for the reception of truth, by dismissing, or at least lessening his hold on, all such crude and hastily adopted notions respecting the objects and relations he is about to examine, as may tend to embarrass or mislead him; and to strengthen himself by something of an effort and a resolve for the unprejudiced admission of any conclusion which shall appear to be supported by careful observation and logical argument, even should it prove of a nature adverse to notions he may have previously formed for himself, or taken up, without examination, on the credit of others. Such an effort is, in fact, a commencement of that intellectual discipline which forms one of the most important ends of all science. It is the first movement of approach towards that state of mental purity which alone can fit us for a full and steady perception of moral beauty as well as physical adaptation. It is the "euphrasy and rue" with which we must "purge our sight" before we can receive and contemplate as they are the lineaments of truth and nature.—Sir John Herschel.

IMPORTANT DECISION.—Everybody is going to buy HOLIDAY PRESENTS, at extremely low prices, at FELDBUSH & CO.'s, because they have the largest assortment and most magnificent display of FANCY GOODS AND TOYS ever seen in any part of the world, which are now being unpacked and offered for sale at wholesale, at No. 531 Washington street, and retail at No. 207 Montgomery street, in Ross House Block, San Francisco.

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electro-pathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathize with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health! The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required! All letters answered with promptness and with pleasure, if directed to

CURE YOUR COLD!
SAVE YOUR LUNGS!

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP
HAS CURED THOUSANDS!

—AND—

IT WILL CURE YOU!

"A Cough is generally the effect of a cold which has either been improperly treated or entirely neglected. When it proves obstinate, there is always reason to fear the consequences, as this shows a weak state of the lungs, and is often the forerunner of consumption"—Buchan's Domestic Medicine.

STOP THAT COUGHING!

Some of you can't, and we pity you. You have tried every remedy but the one destined by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure; but

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP!

Is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Brouchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by its surprising curative powers.

WHAT KILLED HIM?

Dr. Hall, in his Journal of Health, speaking of the death of Washington Irving, asks the above question, and adds: "He might well have remained with us for some years to come had it not been for advice, kindly intended, no doubt, but given in thoughtlessness and reckless ignorance."

HE HAD A COLD!

Which, by some injudicious prescription, had been converted into Asthma." Let me say to Dr. Hall, that "prescription" was not

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP.

Keep it in the house—use it freely—give it to your children upon the slightest indication of a cold, and you will think and speak of it as all do who have become acquainted with its merits.

PENSEROSA.

Is it sin to deal with sorrow?
Looking upward through our tears,
All the breadth of sky is clearer
And twice beautiful and dearer
Seems the coming of the morrow,
As we struggle with our fears;
Wherefore should we comfort borrow

While the woe may come again?
For our little life is brief,
And though never joy should light it,
Truly not our tears shall blight it,
For the Christ once suffered pain,
And he was acquainted with grief;
He, the blessed Christ, did deign

Himself to weep. What matter whether Smile or sigh? The fairest bow,
Where the sun the spray bath kissed,
There it blossoms in the mist,
Till it withers in fair weather;
Beautiful is grief, I know
Peace and tears may dwell together.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 7th, 1864.

"SHREDS AND PATCHES."

I HAVE a habit of wandering about the streets, gazing in the shop windows and watching the faces and dress of the pedestrians. These Christmas times present opportunities for the gratification of this propensity of mine that no other period of the year can do. I don't allow the rain and mud to repress me.

Influenza, rheumatism and lumbago are horrors, but they fail to deter me from an obstinate and frequent mingling with the world, and, during the recent holidays, watching humanity under the influences of that charity which has its best expression at this season of hallowed religious and home festivals. It occurs to me now that Christianity has its noblest triumphs on the domain of domestic life—in its consecration of home. Just here steps in the corollary that the most efficient and durable evangelism is found at the ingleside and the mother's knee. I think that religion is more a matter of heart than of reason. In after years, when the world has rubbed us rather roughly—when we are slightly touched by the gout blasé, and the ragged appearance of our eyebrows admonishes us that we are walking well up to two score, then as we fall into a brown study, we remember nothing the priest taught us; but the little hymns and the catechism we caught from a mother's lips, these come back to us through tears, and, associated with all these remembrances, perhaps the very brightest, is the home festival of Christmas, by which christianity becomes a part of our common life, uniting itself with the faces and voices of those we loved and beautifully embroidering its teachings with the tenderest charities and reminiscences of home life.

The Romish Church understands this truth; it understands how necessary it is to make itself felt through the routine of the commonest condition, and so it is that it weaves its traditions, its legends, its ritual and its worship with the innermost sanctities of home. With almost all other sects, Theology pays a mensural visit, preaches a stiff little perfection, and then bows itself off until the succeeding month.

The sentiment and romance of Christmas are not to be met with in those shops where ponderous silver tureens and diamond pins and diamond brooches are resplendent behind plate glass. Santa Claus doesn't belong to such places. The spots where wholesome lessons are taught, the chapters of life illustrated by delightful little wood-cuts, are in the quiet streets where Dives is never found. And so it is that during the last fortnight my promenades have been where the little dealers abound—the small-toy gentry among whose wares the true chiaro oscuro of life is to be seen, and where one can gladden himself with the luxury of seeing unstilted human nature—dear little child nature—brown cheeks, long-lashed eyes, dancing gladsome eyes—little crickets whose chirrupings are from heart and hearth.

One of my favorite resorts was on Third street in a little shop so circumscribed that eight, perhaps six, adults would fill it uncomfortably full. There was nothing in this shop that elevated it above a half-dozen neighbors. I doubt if all the chattels therein contained would have sold at public vendue for two hundred dollars, but then you saw there such queer toys: giants with three heads, cross-eyed villainous-looking ogres, peevish Punches and scolding Judys and such-like. The proprietor seemed to have selected the most diabolical of toys; the merry and tender were discarded; even "Little Red Riding Hood" and the "Children of the Wood"—tragic and sad as are their histories, they were too mild types of the Terrible in nursery literature for our vendor. He dealt—he delighted—in the highest expression of the grotesquely horrible, and yet I think it was less to gratify a passion for diablerie than a development of genius that taught him that the surest means of success was first to elicit attention, and that small boys, who are more or less wild, belligerent savages, preferred Mephistopheles to Faust. Twice a day for at least ten days did I see one little fellow standing at that shop-window; I wondered if he didn't pass all the day-hours there, wondering and questioning with his little mind where all the figures came from, and whether St. Nicholas, with

"Broad face and a little round belly,
That shook when he laughed, like a bowl-full of jelly," was not, after all, a real personage, reindeer, sleigh and all. Alas! alas! that we should ever lose these illusions of our childhood—these harmless myths which embroider our first years—making them so beautiful! When weary with the dust and travel of our later life, how often would we, if we could, follow back until we came to these innocent fictions of our earliest days, even to the bosoms and lullaby of our mothers, and so to slumber!

My statuette I found to be a cripple, he has some paralysis of the left leg, which made crutches indispensable. As with all cripples of that age, he has a bright face, and yet the predominant expression was sadness. His clothes declared his condition to be humble; at the knees they were patched, and he wore a hat with a brim that, drooping over his face, left his cheeks in shadow, deepening the sadness of look referred to. Leaning forward until his nose flattened against the pane, he would peer at the figures that dangled from strings stretched from side to side of the window, apparently never weary of Punch's nose and the big club of the Giants. And to show what lessons come from our sympathies, and that pity teaches a rare good breeding, I can say, that as often as I have seen my enfant boiteux there, and frequently in the company of a score of shaggy looking boys, I have always noticed that the central stand-point, the "coigne of advantage" was surrendered to him. And that, let the jostling have been as vehement as could be, he held his place by general courtesy and acclaim.

One day I took the little fellow by the hand and led him into the shop. The ragged gamins pressed up within the door; the toy man, too, looked wonderingly, and my cripple, half reluctant, gazed at me with a strange puzzled look, undecided whether to halt or go in. When I got him well in, where he could look at the shelves, peopled with these prodigious wonders, these strange figures with their distorted but human shapes, the poor weakling gained his aplomb, the calm of his face was broken by a smile, and then laughter shook him as with a tempest. Ah! Gould and Curry, when yester night you trod the aisle toward the chancel, and a fair hand was laid in thine with its promise to cling to you "for better or for worse, for richer or poorer," I hope some cripple's blessings went with you there, some prayers from poor bosoms made glad by your bounty—for such are jewels beyond those made by human cunning—which shine and sparkle in that far off land where we pick them up again and wear forever.

When I told my little friend to select a brace of toys, he looked at me, and I translated his wonder as asking whether I was the good man of the story books, or whether he had fairly understood me. A moment more all speculation had gone, and he accepted it as a reality, by pointing to an enormous jumping Jack. To this was added a book full of strange pictures, and then he hobbled off, surrounded by the boys at the door, forgetting to thank me. He had no need to do it; his face was full of blessings, and in my fancy I went with him until he joined the little "hairs" at his home—for whom he made Jack jump until their laugh was hushed in sleep.

The old year went out, shrouded in mist and rain, and with it speeded the life of one who has been to me, for years past,

"Kin as horse's ear and eye."

on the first day of the New Year I saw him for the last time as he lay in Death's arms, hushed and tranquil. I saw him borne into the church, through a gateway of Christmas evergreens. I saw the robed priest stretch compassionate hands over him, I heard the subdued chanting of the choir, and the solemn service of the dead. Heaven seems to manifest itself strangely. Death comes, we are touched by his hand, and in a moment all the beauty and power of the man are gone, and nothing is left but a "kneaded clod"—tears and broken hearts. We stand by the shores of the unknown sea, with outstretched arms, yet the faces of those we loved look not back to us, and we hear their voices no more. Human philosophy can not penetrate these ways and workings of Him from whose very wonders it is born, and yet we know that He "marks the sparrow's fall," lifts to the sun the fragile petals of the violet, clothes the meadows in splendor, and gilds the waving fields with grain. He brings night, and through its darkness and gloom, leads us on to the golden day. There are lessons in these common manifestations of Divine power—we see design and goodness everywhere. Is man, then, His noblest work, to be excluded from this compassion? Will He bruise the beauty of His own lineage and with pain, crush it out forever?

"Shall man alone,
Imperial man! be sown in barren ground,
Less privileged than grain, on which he feeds?"

No, no! as I looked on thy pale features, my friend, and as I saw the smile that lingered there, I felt that "There is no Death! What seems so is transition,

Though life, of mortal breath,
Is but a suburb of the life Elysian,
Whose portal we call Death."

OUR NEW YORK LETTER.

[FROM THE CALIFORNIAN'S LADY CORRESPONDENT.]

NEW YORK, December 3, 1864.

THE past few days have been eventful with Turkeys and with Fires. The latter were not applied to the former in all cases. The roasting of human beings was contemplated by one or more miscreants, and ingeniously attempted. Providence did not favor them, but the attempt, if not the deed, confounds them. It is remarkable that the panics which occurred in the crowded theatres when the alarm of fire was given on Friday night did not reach the dangerous bounds of a suffocating stampede. At the Winter Garden which was jammed to excess, when the alarm was cried, a man in the gallery jumped to his feet and exclaimed: "There was a fire fifteen minutes ago, but it is just out now!" The tumult was at once allayed. A reward should be offered for the apprehension of that Good Liar, for he knew nothing about the fire. At Niblo's nothing happened to the audience, except fainting fits. There was more phosphorus used that night than is spoken of in the papers. The horrible combination was a wide one. Nobody has been caught yet; the heads of the police keep off newspaper reporters at present, and the reporters are obliged to romance on the subject. When the wretches are found they will be hung by martial law, State law and the Lynch law. I fear now that phosphorus will be the fashion as vitriol was a few years ago. I have already heard of its being found in private houses, with ignited matches. A torpedo was put in the stateroom of one of the Sound boats a few nights since at New London, and discovered just as the match was burned down. These acts, I hope, are the expiring throes of a discomfited enemy, performed by the refuse of a failed cause—the hangers-on of any service which promises booty.

The Army of the Potomac on Thanksgiving Day, doubtless sang Muller's Challenge, with a difference.

"I take a turkey's feather,
I stick it in my hat;
My hat has no band to speak of,
But my heart, speaks 'pit-a-pat.'"
"What means the turkey's feather?
Oh that is a home-like sound;
It cries: 'My love sends the best one
In all the country round.'"

"If rebels know a better,
And if they feed on thee,
Stick on a turkey's feather;
Come, rebels, and tangle with me!"

Theodore Roosevelt, the treasurer of the Turkey Association, had fifty thousand dollars sent him to buy turkeys with for the soldiers. Besides this sum expended, the country people sent turkeys by the hundred to their relations in the army. Mr. Roosevelt had several thousand surplus dollars on hand, and applied to the Department for a list of the posts in the vicinity of New York, in order to send a few birds to the soldiers occupying them; but the posts were already supplied, Hart's Island alone having two thousand pounds of gobbler for its invalids to digest. I hope Mr. Roosevelt will prepare fricasseed chicken for their Christmas dinner; they will be hungry by that time. Our soldiers seem to be treated somewhat on the Anaconda principle at present; they are now stuffed and torpid. Speaking of "wake snakes" reminds me of General Grant's visit to New York. He came up from his headquarters in his old clothes; went to the Astor House where he smoked and talked with his wife, but held no levees nor had any aids to slash the stairs and ante-rooms. He took a walk in Broadway to look into the shop windows, and nobody knew him except his own portraits, some fifty in number, which might have winked a military recognition. On his way up town in the cars with a friend, a lady came in to whom he gave his seat. The friend said to the conductor, "Can't you give General Grant a seat?" "General Grant!" the conductor answered, "you can't fool me, General Grant don't wear no such clothes as them." And so the General had to stand.

The three Booths, as I intimated in my last, played together in Julius Caesar, for the benefit of the Shakespeare monument, and cleared over four thousand dollars.

The Christmas books continue to arrive. I notice that every year the Crusoe element reappears in literature for the young. The Crusoe element means getting something palatable to eat under great difficulty. Miller has published the original Robinson Crusoe in a thick finely-printed volume. Hurd & Houghton, a new firm, have a new and handsome edition of The Swiss Family Robinson, which in merit stands nearest to De Foe, of all the imitations. Walker, Wise & Co., of Boston, have published The Young Crusoe, which has quite as many comfortable eatables as its predecessors. If a savage life would make us as hungry and thirsty as all the Crusoes are, let us return to barbarism. I meet people who eat, but I do not find those who are hungry any more. An appetite is one of the "last arts," or a dead instinct, which being cast on a desert island might revive.

A "ground" work of Gail Hamilton's, A New Atmosphere.

is just out. Gail, who has written some bright things, now informs us that "the interests of humanity demand a purification." Therefore, it is to be trusted that her new atmosphere will do the business for us. It appears to me that she imitates Emerson as much as a person can imitate him, who is totally devoid of his intellectual qualities. Here is a specimen: "Life is a momentous thing. It may be an eternal curse. It is certain to involve deep sorrow. Sin, disease, pain, are almost sure to follow in its wake." These sentences are Emersonian in brevity, but not in originality. The pith of A New Atmosphere is the wrongs of women, the culture of women, and the acknowledged evil behavior and cursed selfishness of all fathers, brothers, and husbands. If it were not for this, and for that, woman would be the conglomerate angel, amazon, law-giver, inventor, and artist which nature intended her to be. Gail, in common with Mrs. Farnham, and others of that ilk, gives the lie to the Ages, which teach us that women cannot be supreme, except by their sweet influence. America is the chosen paradise for the emancipated woman. Let us see what emancipation will do for the brains of the gentler sex. So far America has never produced a great woman. There are Gails, Stowes, Ferns, Homers, Kelloggs, Prescotts, I grant; but are they great?

Ticknor & Fields will issue in a few days a book they are taking the most expensive pains with—Enoch Arden, illustrated. The drawings of Vedder, Laforge and Hennessey are remarkable, tinged with a pre-Raphaelite horror and pain, especially those by Vedder, the painter of the celebrated sea-serpent. Tilton is also about ready to issue Enoch Arden, illustrated by Billings. It is a pretty quarrel as it stands, but it is probable that the poorest piece of work will win—namely, Tilton's.

E. D. B. S.

THE SUSPECTED SPY.

DURING the time that Murat held military rule at Madrid, he had occasion to send important dispatches to Junot, then at Lisbon; but it was a matter of great difficulty, as all the roads to Lisbon were in possession of the army of Castagnos—troops commanded by the most distinguished men of the Spanish revolution—and were also infested by a more dreaded enemy of the French, the guerillas.

Murat spoke of his embarrassment to Baron Strogonoff, the Russian ambassador at Madrid. Russia was at this time the friend more than the ally of France. After some consideration, Strogonoff said he thought it could be managed. He proposed that a Polish lancer, dressed in the Russian uniform, should be charged with dispatches from his court to Admiral Siniavin, who was then at the port of Lisbon, and that he might at the same time convey verbal dispatches from Murat. This scheme, he thought, was the more practicable, as the insurgent army of Castagnos was very desirous to obtain the neutrality of Russia, and therefore it was not likely they would give cause of umbrage by ill treating its messenger.

Murat was delighted with this ingenious plan, and immediately sent a request to Krasinski, the Polish commander, to be furnished with any young man of his corps whom he could recommend as brave, intelligent, and of good address. A young Pole, eighteen years of age, named Leckinski, volunteered for the dangerous service.

Murat, who himself could calmly look death in the face, could not, however, in this instance, help pointing out to Leckinski the great peril he would be in should he be discovered. The young Pole smiled and said, "I thank your imperial highness for having honored me above my comrades by selecting me for this duty, and I promise to render a good account of my mission." This bold and unaffected reply inspired the confidence of Murat, who forthwith gave him his instructions, when he departed for Lisbon dressed in the Russian uniform, and furnished with the dispatches for Admiral Siniavin.

The two first days passed without molestation; but about the afternoon of the third, Leckinski was surrounded and taken prisoner by a Spanish troop, who, having disarmed him, dragged him before the commanding officer, who happened to be Castagnos himself. Let the chief be who he might, however, Leckinski saw that he was inevitably lost if he was recognised as a partisan of the French. He therefore determined on the instant not to speak a word of French, and only to answer in Russian or German, both of which languages he could speak fluently.

The dreadful imprecations uttered on all sides in his way to Castagnos, told him his doom was already sealed. He had before his eyes the horrible fate of General René, who, a few weeks before this, in executing a mission similar to his own—endeavoring to join Junot—had been assassinated in the most barbarous way, and expired amidst the most frightful tortures. Death by torture creates terror even to the stoutest heart, and the blood round the heart of the young Pole froze within him for an instant.

"Who are you?" said Castagnos in French, which he spoke well, as he had been educated at Sorbize. Leckinski looked at him steadily, and made a sign of ignorance, and answered in German, "I don't understand you." Castagnos, who spoke German, did not perhaps wish to figure further in the matter, as he left one of his staff to continue the interrogatories.

The young Pole answered alternately in Russian and German, but never once let slip the least French intonation. He was, however, very uneasy, as he was in a very small room, surrounded by a crowd of men eager for his blood, who only waited for his being pronounced French to fall on him and massacre him.

These sanguinary feelings increased to a pitch beyond the control of even the general himself, in consequence of what appeared as a most unlucky incident. An aide-de-camp of Castagnos, a man fanatically patriotic, as there were many in the Spanish war, and who, the moment Leckinski was taken, pronounced him to be a French spy, rushed into the chamber, dragging a peasant dressed in brown cloth, with a red feather in a high conical hat. The officer made way through the crowd, and, placing the man opposite Leckinski, said, "Look well at this man, and say whether he is really a Russian or a German. He is a spy; I will swear it with my life," said he, stamping furiously.

The peasant in the meantime attentively examined the features of the young Pole. The examination was not long; for, darting a malignant glance, with his eyes burning with rage, he clapped his hands, and cried out, "He is a Frenchman! he is a Frenchman!" and then told them that he had been only a few weeks ago at Madrid with some cut straw, which had been required from his village, as well as from every other in the district. "And I recognize this man," continued the peasant, "as he who received my portion of forage, and who gave me a receipt for it." This was true. Castagnos possibly saw the truth of it; but he was a noble and generous adversary, and it was not by massacres that he wished to build up the edifice of Spanish liberty, which would have been raised more beautifully, and more durably, had such men as himself, Romana, and Palafox, had the sole direction of affairs. He saw well that the young man was not a Russian, but he dreaded the horrible atrocities which would have been inflicted on him, should he be identified as a Frenchman. There was a doubt, and, above all, his appearance bespoke favor. He proposed, therefore, that he should be allowed to continue his journey, for Leckinski persisted that he was a Russian, and did not know a word of French. But at the first word the general uttered, there arose a hundred threatening voices, and even murmurs of the word traitor applied to himself. There seemed then no hope for mercy, for man becomes ferocious when he fears for himself. "You wish, then," said he, "to risk a rupture with Russia, whose neutrality we have solicited?" "No!" said his officers; "but let us prove this man."

Leckinski heard all, for he understood Spanish. He was led out of the chamber, and thrown into a place which might have passed for one of the most frightful dungeons of the Inquisition. At the moment the Spaniards had stopped him, he had not eaten anything since the night before, and when the door of his prison closed on him, he had been eighteen hours without food. Add to this the fatigue he had undergone, the anguish and deep anxiety of his situation, and it will not be considered surprising that he fell nearly fainting on his wretched bed, which was placed in a corner of the room. The sun was not yet set. He had a glimpse of it through the cleft in the wall above his head, and the light, so brilliant in beautiful Estremadura, for a time cheered the heart of the poor prisoner.

This source of consolation, however, soon left him; the heavens became murky and cheerless; night closed around all; and poor Leckinski had full leisure to contemplate his dreadful position, which he judged as almost without the least hope.

He was undoubtedly a brave man. But to die at eighteen; it was very young. He battled with the visions which came before him and succeeded each other as in a phantasmagoria; at length youth and fatigue yielded, and he was shortly buried in the most profound sleep, the very image of death.

He had slept for about two hours, when the door of his prison was gently opened, and some one entered on tip-toe. A hand was placed before the lamp, and then some one leaned over the bed of the prisoner. The hand was taken suddenly from before the light, and he was touched slightly on his shoulder, and the sweet and gentle tones of a woman's voice said in French, "Do you wish to take supper?" Leckinski suddenly jumped up in his bed, with his eyes scarcely opened, and said in German, "What do they want with me?"

"Let this man have something to eat," said Castagnos, on learning the result of this first proof, "and then let his horse be saddled, and allow him to pursue his journey. He is not a Frenchman. How could he be master of himself at such a time?—it is impossible."

But Castagnos was not alone. They gave Leckinski something to eat; but his horse was not saddled, and he remained in his prison till the morning. He was then taken to a place, and was shown the bodies of ten Frenchmen, who had been horribly massacred by the peasants of Truxilla. They kept him here all the day, threatening him with death, and that a horrible one. Constantly surrounded with snares, listened to with the most eager ears in order to catch a sound which might betray him, and watched by the most piercing eyes to discover a suspicious movement, he nevertheless maintained his equanimity. He had passed his word not to flinch, and he was resolved to keep it, and fulfil his commission. Not a single gesture or word of a suspicious nature escaped him. At length, after many hours of the most cruel trials, he was reconducted to his prison, and left to all the horrors of his uncertain fate.

"Gentlemen," said Castagnos, "I feel with you the great importance of preventing communication between the chiefs of the French army who are in Spain; but here, in the position in which we find this officer, we cannot treat him as a spy upon the simple assertion of one of our men. This man may be deceived by a resemblance, and then we shall become murderers—a part certainly ill becoming us to take, gentlemen."

Poor Leckinski felt a degree of pleasure in re-entering his dungeon, which was comparatively an agreeable change from what he had undergone for the last twelve hours. He had had nothing before his eyes but gibbets and hideous bloody carcasses, exhibited to him by men with the looks of demons, and the most ferocious countenances. His thoughts were, as it were, under the influence of a spell. He believed he saw on the cracked walls of his prison the fantastic shadows of the victims he had seen hanging from the trees on the roadside. Surrounded by these gloomy visions, exhausted nature again overcame him, and he fell into a deep sleep.

During this repose, his door was again softly opened, and his bed approached. The same gentle voice said in French, "Get up, and come; you are saved, and your horse is saddled."

The courageous Leckinski, however, always on his guard, said in German, "What do they want with me?"

Castagnos, on learning the result of this new proof, declared that the young Russian was a noble fellow. He had thought so, he said, all along. But this opinion could not sway the commission, who wished to find him guilty, and were outrageous at being thwarted in their wishes. All party spirit tends to weaken our just judgments of things; but the party spirit at this time in Spain raged with indescribable violence. These men, being baffled in accomplishing their blood-thirsty desire for a human sacrifice, were completely beside themselves. They were the same judges who had condemned General René to be saved in two! who had placed Colonel Pavetti in an oven, and had horribly mutilated Franceschi.

Leckinski knew his danger, but he quailed not. After another dreadful night, four men, one of whom was the same who said he had seen him at Madrid, came to conduct him before a sort of tribunal, composed of many of the officers of the staff of General Castagnos. During the short interval on his way, they uttered the most terrible threats; but, true to his resolution, Leckinski appeared not to understand what they said. When he came before the judges, he appeared to understand what was going on, more from the preparations than what was said around him. He asked where his interpreter was. The examination commenced. He was asked what his object was in travelling from Madrid to Lisbon. He answered by showing his dispatches from the Russian ambassador, and his passport. This would certainly have been sufficient, had he not unfortunately been recognized by the peasant. But the assertion of this man, persisted in with great firmness, afforded strong evidence of his real character to men so eagerly athirst for his blood. "Ask him," said the president of the commission, "if he loves the Spaniards, since he is not a Frenchman."

"Yes, undoubtedly," said Leckinski; "I love the Spanish nation, and I esteem it for its beautiful devotion. I wish our two nations were friends."

"Colonel," said the interpreter in French, "the prisoner says that he hates us, because we make war like banditti. He despises us, and he only regrets that it is not in his power to unite the whole nation into a single man that he might end the war with one blow."

Whilst the interpreter spoke, every eye was on Leckinski, watching for the least movement of his countenance on hearing this unfaithful interpretation of his answer. But on coming to the tribunal he had made up his mind to every trial, and he therefore maintained the most astonishing self-possession.

"If they kill me," he thought to himself, "they will not only kill an innocent man, but one who has all the appearance of innocence, and they will therefore have all the odium of my death."

"Gentlemen," said Castagnos, who, contrary to his wishes, assisted at this last trial, but would take no part in it, "it appears to me that this young man cannot be suspected. The peasant must have been deceived. Let him, therefore, be set at liberty, and continue his route; and in rendering an account of what he has undergone at our hands, he will do well to take into consideration the continual danger of our position, which must excuse the rigor we are forced to employ."

They then restored Leckinski his arms and dispatches, and gave him a safe passport; and he went away victorious over, it certainly may be said, as strong tests as were ever practised on a human being. He arrived at Lisbon, fulfilled his mission, and expressed a willingness to return to Madrid; but Junot would not allow the brave fellow to run such another risk.

THE CORAL GROVE.

DEEP in the wave is a Coral Grove,
Where the purple mullet, and gold-fish rove,
Where the sea-flower spreads its leaves of blue
That never are wet with falling dew,
But in bright and changeable beauty shine,
Far down in the green and glassy brine.
The floor is of sand, like the mountain drift,
And the pearl shells spangle the flinty snow;
From the coral rocks the sea-plants lift
Their boughs, where the tide and billows flow;
The water is calm and still below,
For the winds and waves are absent there,
And the sands are bright as the stars that glow
In the motionless fields of upper air.
There with its waving blade of green,
The sea flag streams through the silent water,
And the crimson leaf of the dulcis is seen
To blush like a banner bath'd in slaughter:
There with a light and easy motion,
The fan-coral sweeps through the clear deep sea:
And the yellow and scarlet tufts of the ocean
Are bending, like corn on the upland lea;
And life, in rare and beautiful forms,
Is sporting amid those bowers of stone.
And is safe, when the wrathful spirit of storms,
Has made the top of the wave his own:
And when the ship from his fury flies,
Where the myriad voices of ocean roar,
When the wind god frowns in the murky skies,
And demons are waiting the wreck on shore;
Then far below, in the peaceful sea,
The purple mullet and the gold-fish rove,
Where the waters murmur tranquilly,
Through the bending twigs of the Coral Grove.

MISS M. E. BRADDON'S NEW NOVEL.

ONLY A CLOD.

CHAPTER X.

COLTONSLOUGH.

FRANCIS TREDETHLYN went back to his hotel in Covent Garden after that quiet dinner at the Cedars, and his mind was full of the new images suggested by that brief glimpse of a life that was strange to him. He had been very much interested by Miss Desmond, and he tried to believe that he preferred her to Maude Hillary. Had she not been kinder to him, more friendly and familiar? and was it not reasonable that he should like her the better of the two? He was naturally of a grateful disposition, disposed to think meanly of his own merits, and he attributed all Miss Desmond's kindness to the purest promptings of a benevolent disposition. The idea that the young lady regarded him from a speculative point of view, that she had entertained any notion of possible marriage contracts and settlements, by which she might acquire the use of his thirty thousand per annum, never for a moment entered Mr. Tredethlyn's mind. He knew, in a general way, that he was admitted to Mr. Hillary's drawing-room because his money gave him a kind of right to such society as that of the merchant's household; but he never for a moment imagined that any one of these delightful and high-bred creatures could contemplate any contingency by which his money might become of service to them. Wealth and beauty, elegance and refinement, seemed to find their natural home at the Cedars. Miss Desmond of course was rich, like Miss Hillary.

Francis counted the days which must elapse before that delightful sabbath to be spent by him at the Cedars. Only three days, and during those three days stern duty called him away from London. Had he not declared himself ready to go to the end of the world in search of his cousin Susan Tredethlyn? He felt ashamed even of that one wasted day on the banks of the Thames. He had left his hotel in the morning, intending to despatch his city business with all possible speed, and start immediately afterwards for Coltonsloough. He had found out all about Coltonsloough by means of all manner of inquiries, for it seemed rather an out-of-the-way place, known to very few people as yet. Indeed, Coltonsloough turned out to be a recently-discovered watering-place on the Essex coast, a place whose shores were supposed to be washed by the salt waves of the ocean; but the waste of waters that rolled along the middy shores of Coltonsloough was only an ocean in its hobbledehoyhood, and savored too much of the Thames and Medway to be considered a full-grown sea.

To the traveller who has grown familiar with the centre of Africa, to that bold explorer who has spent lonely days and nights amidst those darksome forests in which the forgotten cities of America lie buried, to the prisoner newly released from solitary confinement in the great prison-house of New York, so pleasantly entitled the Tombs—to one of these a newly-discovered watering-place may not appear dull. He who has been used to hear no more familiar voices than the distant cry of the bitter, far away amongst the swampy wildernesses, may endure Herne Bay and live. The criminal who has undergone a decade of solitary confinement in the Tombs, may possibly survive a month at Southend: but to the ordinary mind there is a modern abomination of desolation lurking in the unfinished terraces of a budding watering-place, or in a watering-place which has put forth its tender blossoms in the way of bow-windowed receptacles for the concentrated bleakness of perpetual east winds, and has been blighted in the bud.

Coltonsloough was very young; it was in the most infantine stage of watering-place existence. Speculative builders had bought half a dozen plots of swamp and mud, and had erected dismal rows of houses, which turned their backs upon one another, and started off at right angles from one another, in utter contempt for all uniformity. If the melancholy sojourner at Coltonsloough was of an active turn of mind, he was apt to be tormented by a wild desire to pull down and rearrange those straggling terraces, between which stretched hideous deserts of waste ground, with here and there a lurking pitfall, whence gravel, or sand, or clay, or chalk, had been dug by unknown persons, who seemed always digging something or other out of Coltonsloough, whereby an appearance of volcanic disruption was imparted to a place whose chief merit had been its agreeable flatness.

It was very young. A few straggling excursionists came on the blazing summer Sundays, and prowled about the shore with countenances expressive of supreme disappointment and disgust. Half a dozen families of cockney children were wont to congregate by the dismal waters every summer, provided with baskets for the collection of shells—and there were no shells at Coltonsloough—and further provided with wooden spades for the undermining of sand—and there was no sand at that baby watering-place. Families did certainly come, beguiled by representations of impossibly cheap provisions, though the place was in reality very expensive, for every tradesman was a monopolist on a small scale. Families came, but no family ever came a second time to Coltonsloough; and it may be that in the wonderful scheme of the universe, this newborn watering-place was not without its special use; inasmuch as it made people contented with London. The inhabitant of Bermondsey, returning to that locality after a sojourn at Coltonsloough, found beauties in some dismal street which until that hour had appeared to his prosaic mind a street, and nothing more. The denizen of Ratcliff Highway sat down amongst his household gods, well pleased with a neighborhood which, although not unobjectionable, was a paradise as compared with Coltonsloough.

It was to this place of desolation that a newly finished offshoot of the railway then known as the Eastern Counties conveyed Francis Tredethlyn. He went to look for his cousin, with no better clue to help him in his search than that one word, "Coltonsloough," copied from the post-mark of Susan's letter.

"But I won't be baffled," the young man thought, as he sat in the railway carriage thinking of the task that lay before him; "Coltonsloough may be a big place, but I'll question every living creature in it before I'll give up the chance of finding out something about my cousin."

Luckily for Mr. Tredethlyn's chances, Coltonsloough was a very small place, and after walking backwards and forwards for some quarter of an hour, before the emporium of the one butcher, the solitary baker, who dabbled a little in the fruit and confectionery line, and the single grocer—who was also a liendraper, and beyond that a stationer, who had a side of bacon hanging on one side of his door, and a piece of showy cotton stuff upon the other, and who, moreover, was sole master of the Coltonsloough post-office—Francis determined upon his plan of action. He had thought of his cousin very constantly in the few days before his visit to Mr. Hillary's mansion; he had thought of her a great deal since then, though he had not found it quite so easy to concentrate his ideas, by reason of a certain bright face and slender figure, all in a flutter of white and blue, that would sometimes intrude themselves upon his meditations.

Francis knew that his uncle's daughter had left Tredethlyn Grange with only a few sovereigns in her pocket, perhaps not much more than enough to defray her journey to London. Without money, without friends, she had fled from her home, and had not perished; but had lived to write to her father from this dismal watering-place of Coltonsloough, some years after her flight. It was clear, therefore, that in the interim she must have either been supported by the benevolence of strangers, or she must have earned her own living. The last hypothesis was the more likely to be correct. Susan Tredethlyn had been educated to habits of industry, and had no doubt confronted the battle of life as fearlessly as any Tredethlyn should confront any battle.

"Poor little girl! she went out as a servant, I dare say," thought the young man. "She drudged and slaved for some hard mistress, perhaps, while her father was adding every day to the money that has come to me—to me—and he refused me a couple of hundred pounds the night my mother was dying."

Mr. Tredethlyn went in at the grocer's doorway. There was scarcely room enough for him to pass between the bacon and the cotton stuff, which some aboriginal of Coltonsloough would some day transform into wearing apparel. The postmaster was chopping some very sawdust sugar in the dusky inner regions of the shop; but he left off chopping, and advanced to meet the stranger.

Francis Tredethlyn was no diplomatist. He was quite unskilled in that peculiar science known as beating about the bush, so he began to make inquiries respecting his cousin with as little preface as he would have employed had he been asking for a pound of sugar.

"I'm a stranger in this place," he said, "and I want to ask a few questions; and I fancy, as you're postmaster, you must be about the likeliest person to answer them."

The grocer rubbed his hands and smirked, in a manner that was expressive of a general desire to do anything obliging—of course with an eye to ultimate profit.

"A young woman—a relation of mine—left her home four years ago this month. For three years no one belonging to her could discover where she was. At the end of that time a letter was received from her, bearing the post-mark of this place. I want to find whether she is still here; or, if not, when she left. I have only just come back from Van Diemen's Land, to find things changed in the place that was once my home. So I'm groping in the dark, you see, and shall be very thankful to any one that'll lend me a helping hand."

Something in the frankness of his manner, the earnestness of his face, went straight home to the heart of the Coltonsloough postmaster, who became less a tradesman, and more a man.

"It's rather puzzling, you see, in the way you put it," he said, scratching his nose meditatively. "You want a young woman who wrote a letter—or, leastways, had a letter posted at this place. But, lor bless you, not being under Government y'rself, you see, you've no notion of the dodges they're up to when they want to throw any one off the scent like with a post-mark. Why, I dessay I could get a letter posted from Jericho to-morrow morning, if I only gave my mind to it. What might be the name of the young woman as you're anxious to find?"

"Her name is Tredethlyn," Francis answered, hopelessly; "but as she ran away from home, and most likely wanted to hide herself from her relations, she may have changed her name."

The postmaster mused for a few moments, and then shook his head gravely.

"I never heard of no Tredevillings in Coltonsloough," he said. "The young person was independent in her circumstances, I suppose?"

"Oh, no, indeed! she had very little money when she left home. She must have worked for her living. I should think it likely she went out as a servant; for she was a country-bred girl, and had been used to a hard life, though her father was a very rich man."

A very rich man! That part of the business sounded interesting, and the grocer pricked up his ears.

"A country-bred young person," he repeated, "by the name of Tredevillane. And what might be the date of the letter with the Coltonsloough post-mark?"

Francis did not know the exact date. He could only inform the postmaster that the letter must have reached Cornwall about eighteen months, before the present time.

"Cornwall!" cried the postmaster; "then the country-bred young woman was a Cornish woman?"

"Yes, my cousin, Susan Tredethlyn, was a Cornish woman."

"A Cornish woman, and by the name of Susan! Why, if you'd put the date of the letter a good three years back, instead of a year and a half, I should have been able to lay my hand upon y'r cousin there and then, in a manner of speaking."

"How so?"

"Because I did know a young person that lived with Mrs. Burfield in Trafalgar Terrace. But that young person left Coltonsloough full three years ago, and I've never set eyes on her since."

"But tell me all you know about her!" exclaimed Francis almost breathless in his eagerness. "What was she like? Why do you fancy that she was the girl I am looking for?"

"Because, in the first place, she was Cornish. I'd noticed that her talk was different, somehow, from that of the folks about here—though she was as soft spoken as any lady bred and born; but one day she was staiding in my shop, with the children as she had care of, taking shelter from a storm, and a regular pelter it was too, and she stood looking out to sea through yonder half-glass door, which it were shut at the time being, and I made some remark about the unpleasantness of the weather, out of politeness like—for the young woman came very often to my shop for groceries, and with lodgers' letters—Mrs. Burfield takes lodgers, and so forth; but she looked at me in a kind of absent way, and said, 'Oh, I like it! I like it!' 'You like the storm, Miss?' I exclaimed; and then she answered all of a sudden, 'Yes, I like to see it. This place doesn't seem so strange to me to day as it generally does. I've seen just such a storm as this from the moor on which my father's house stands, and I could almost fancy I was at home in Cornwall."

"And that's how you found out she was a Cornish woman. I think you've about hit it, Mr. Sanders. I think the girl who talked to you about the storm must have been my cousin, Susan Tredethlyn."

"Her name was Susan," answered Mr. Sanders; "I've heard Mrs. Burfield's children call her so in the very shop. She came to Coltonslough as governess to Mrs. Burfield's young family."

"A governess!" said Francis, with some slight sense of relief. "She was a governess, then, and not a servant?"

"Oh dear, no! Though, Coltonslough being a very small place, you see, sir, and most of the inhabitants being a good deal dependent upon lodgers, which gives a kind of fluctuating character to life, as you may say, sir, a governess in Coltonslough might not be looked upon exactly in the same light as elsewhere. Or, to put it plainer, sir, a governess in Coltonslough would not be expected to be proud."

"Oh, I understand," Mr. Tredethlyn answered, rather bitterly. "Yes, my cousin was a genteel drudge—not so well paid, perhaps, as vulgar drudges, and rather harder worked."

"The young person was always genteel, sir, even to the extent of wearing gloves, which is not looked upon as indispensable to Coltonslough; but in the matter of going of errands and opening the door, or carrying in a lodger's tea-tray, at a push, she would not be expected to be proud."

"And she left three years ago?"

"She did, sir."

The postmaster looked very grave as he said this—so grave that Francis Tredethlyn could not fail to perceive that something worse than he had yet heard remained to be told. He was not a man to diplomatize, nor yet to make any display of his emotion, but his breath came a little faster for a few moments, and then he asked, abruptly,

"How did she leave?"

Mr. Sanders hesitated a little, and then said, with some embarrassment,

"Why, Coltonslough bein' a gossiping kind of a place, sir, you're apt to hear ever so many different versions of the same thing, and it isn't for me to say which is right and which is wrong. I think, as it is a long story, sir, you'd better hear the rights of it from Mrs. Burfield."

"A long story!" repeated Francis Tredethlyn, in an undertone—"a long story! Ah, my poor little cousin—my poor ill-used girl! And it seems only a little while ago when we played together in the church-yard at Landresdale, in the sunny hour when they let us out of school."

It did seem to him but a very little while since he and his cousin had sat side by side under one of the big yew trees in Landresdale church-yard, dining upon some simple repast of home-made bread and fat bacon with a dessert of unripe apples, in the drowsy sultriness of a summer noontide. He sat for some few minutes, silently thinking of the departed time. The memory of it seemed almost like a sharp physical pain, now that he knew that some great sorrow, some bitter woman's trial had come to his cousin. A story about her—a long story! What story should gossiping tongues have to tell of any woman, except a history of suffering and wrong?

He did not press the Postmaster to tell him anything further, but he said, presently, in an altered voice—a voice that had lost something of its power and ringing vibration:

"I can get to see this Mrs. Burfield, I suppose?"

"Yes, sir, I make no doubt you can. She of is very genteel person, is Mrs. Burfield, which she have known better days, and finds herself often a little drove like with her lodgers. Her house in Number 2, sir, in the Terrace, Trafalgar Square, fronting sideways, and rather slantin' like, to the sea. You can see it, sir, from where you stand."

Following the direction of the Postmaster's extended forefinger, Francis Tredethlyn did see a row of unfinished-looking houses, with the inevitable seaside bow-windows, staring out on a patch of waste ground. Why these houses, and almost all the other houses at Coltonslough should have slanted away from the sea, obliging their occupants to look out upon the expanse of waters in a sideways and sinister manner, when they might have been built directly facing that single feature of attraction, was a problem far beyond the comprehension of any visitor to the infantine watering-place.

A LOCAL STORY "WITH A MORAL."

SUPPOSE that I tell you a story—and let me premise by saying that in all essential particulars the story is a true one. For obvious reasons I suppress the real names, substituting in their stead names so common on door-plates that the parties cannot be identified except by those already familiar with the facts in all their length and breadth. The locality is San Francisco, and the culmination of the story dates but very few months back.

John Smith was an early Californian. He came to this country soon after the discovery of gold, bringing with him nothing but industry and sobriety. These he inherited from his New England parents, and no other legacy did they leave him. But in those early days these in themselves were no inconsiderable capital; people generally left them and several other virtues at home when they packed up their carpet-bags and started for Cape Horn and the Pacific coast—consequently the market was not overstocked, and John found, on his arrival here that he had quite enough to set up in business with.

In fact, he got into business immediately on landing. Not having much baggage of his own to bother with, he assisted in getting that of others on shore, and the employment proved so profitable that he did not abandon it until it became evident that more profit could be made by turning over the money that had accumulated on his hands than by packing trunks about the beach on his back. To labor is to pray, but I hold that the man who contrives to turn the labor of others to such account that both they and himself are benefited, prays with a multiplied power. So, from being the employed, John became, by the simple workings of character and circumstances, the employer, paying wages, not infrequently, to the very men whose bundles he had carried in earlier times. Nature's great law of compensation always verifies itself, if we are only content to give it time.

But it is scarcely worth while to follow John's history through all its lesser pages; suffice it to say that the problem of his life worked out the result which never fails to follow a proper application of the capital which he was blessed with in the beginning, and a competency was his before he had reached that period of years at which men generally set themselves seriously about the task of getting rich. He passed through all the great fires unscathed, and the only mistake that he made after retiring from business was, in getting married. I do not mean to say, understand, that getting married is a mistake, but I do maintain that it very often is, especially if one chances to marry the wrong woman. This was John's misfortune. Finding himself able to maintain a wife, he became nervously anxious on the subject, and looked seriously around among his female acquaintances, prepared to blunder into love as soon as the occasion offered. He did not have long to wait; a pretty face and a pianoforte did their usual work—though John was sensible on all other subjects—and after his determination in that way was reached, a very few months saw him happy in the privilege of paying a young lady's board bill and accompanying her on shopping occasions. As luck would have it, he married the daughter of a fond and foolish mother, and an equally doting father; as a natural consequence, if he did not get a fool for a wife he came very near to it.

I do not say that the young lady was a fool, but I do say that any woman who reaches that dignity which long dresses are supposed to confer, without discovering that there are other things in this life than flounces and feathers and French bonnets, and that God's sunshine was only made for her to exhibit new clothes in, is certainly lacking in good sense.

A year wrought quite a change in John's life. He who had never even seen a cradle rocked in the gullehes came to know considerable about the mysteries of that domestic institution which has been lately made to assist in working a churn and at the same time turn a grindstone. But the change was all on John's part, for none was wrought in the habits of his wife. She was gayer than when a girl, and a marvel of millinery and other things. John's income, ample as it was, was taxed to its utmost to keep the gait going, and he soon began to think of going into business again.

True, he got into business when he married Mary Jones, but a bad business it was.

The mining speculations came along and John tried his hand at them. Speculation in any form was scarcely the forte of a man whose life had been devoted only to legitimate trade—shouldering trunks comes properly enough under that head, but the temptation was great; and as it was evident that something must be done to recuperate his finances, he went in. Being honest, as a very natural consequence soon after going in he went up—or very near it. Expenses had to be curtailed; and the last milliner's bill his wife had contracted was so long in process of settlement that it was not very easy for her to run up another. And the same with the other accommodating tradesmen whom Mary had been in the habit of patronizing; they soon came to know that a pinch had come in John's purse, (for in San Francisco everybody knows everybody's business,) and there were few in town who could not tell to a dot what stock he had operated in and the amount he had lost. Of course all the tradesmen sympathized with him, but none of them would trust his wife—so I do not know but that they are in a measure responsible for all that followed.

For nice clothes and a plenty of them were a necessity to Mrs. Smith. Never in her life had she the slightest ambition to be an angel, because it is commonly understood that angels wear only white, and are not at all addicted to silks and modern bonnets. She would any time have preferred a nice fan to the best harp, and no possible pair of pinions could have compensated her for the loss of one of those light and feathery robes women are accustomed to wear at evening parties.

John's home, never a very pleasant one, was not at all cheered by circumstances such as these. Reproaches met him at night and followed him forth in the morning. His wife assured him that, were she a man, she would be ashamed to be without money—and I do not know but that she was right in that assurance, for being a woman she was ashamed to be without what money would buy. The main wonder is that being a wife, she was not ashamed to be without duty to her husband—that being a mother she was not ashamed to be without affection for her offspring. But these things depend very much on education, and there is no accounting for tastes.

Well, the round world rolled on, and the months blossomed and budded just as ever, notwithstanding the tightness of the times and the gaunt spectre that sat at hearthstones. No apparent change took place in John's household economy; his wife dressed as well as ever—better, if anything—and more of her time was spent in the street than in the days of her husband's financial prosperity. But the terrible under-tow of the sea that drags stragglers in the surf out to destruction does not show on the surface, save in the white faces of the drowned that occasionally gleam up from below, and few would think that the summer cloud which drifts lightly across a quiet sky were big with a lightning-bolt. We know what has been going on, however, when a cenotaph goes up in the country churchyard to the memory of one who went down upon the deep and never returned, or we see a green tree in the forest, its trunk riven and its boughs blasted.

By-and-by gossips began to nod their heads, as if something they knew, and point with suspicious fingers at Mrs. Smith. She was seen in strange company, and strange rumors were rife. After a while there was a divorce suit in the Courts, very quietly conducted, and all mention of it suppressed in the newspapers; those whom the law had joined together the law put asunder, the custody of the children was given to the father; and not very long since a father and his children took passage on the steamer for a new field which is opening for the development of enterprise.

The mother remains. We see her on the streets quite often, but the circle of her acquaintance has dwindled down, and very few ladies promenade with her now. But she dresses better than ever, and I suppose she is perfectly happy. Surely, if the possession of an expensive wardrobe can make a woman so, she should be, for hers cost her husband and children. What the end will be I do not venture to predict, but descent is swift when the feet once take hold of a declivity, and the fate of the wife separated by her own fault from her husband has too often been written to be worthy of speculation or recapitulation here.

My story is done and it points its own moral—if it have any. It is not very remarkable in any of its phases, but these bubbles which occasionally break to the surface reveal what is going on in the unplummeted depths below.—San Francisco Correspondent of the Sacramento Union.

ALCHEMY.—London Notes and Queries publishes the following "strange story," which, it adds, has never been "made a note of." Mr. Malcolm Kinnear, in his Travels in Asia Minor, Armenia, in the year 1813, relates that the British resident at Balsora, Mr. Colquhoun, was visited by an Arabian philosopher, who sought with him protection from certain Arabs who had purposed to torture him out of the secret which he possessed of making gold, and from whose power he had just escaped. He proffered to perform this in Mr. C.'s presence; and, accordingly, after retiring for a few moments, returned with a crucible and chafing dish of coals. When the former had become hot, he took four papers, each containing a whiteish powder out of his pocket, and asked Mr. C. to fetch him a piece of lead. Mr. C. went into his study, took four bullets, weighed them, and returned. These the alchemist put into the crucible, and the whole was immediately fused. After twenty minutes he desired Mr. C. to take it off the fire, and put it in the air to cool. The contents were then removed by Mr. C., and proved to be a piece of gold, valued at ninety piastres (somewhere about £23,) and exactly the weight of the four bullets—the which he left with Mr. C., and engaged to return next day. That night he was carried off by the Sheik of Grani (whence he had escaped) with a body of armed men; and never again, says Mr. Kinnear, heard of.

PATERNAL AFFECTION.—The following letter was sent by a man to his son at College: "My dear son, I write to send you some new socks, which your mother has knit by cutting down some of mine. Your mother sends you ten pounds without my knowledge, and for fear you would not spend it wisely I have kept back half, and only send you five. Your mother and I are well, except that your sister has got the measles. I hope you will do honor to my teaching; if you do not you are a donkey, and your mother and myself are your affectionate parents."

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, 1865.

THEATRES AND NEWSPAPERS.

PROBABLY there is no city in the world where the relations between theatres and newspapers are so little understood as in San Francisco. That the favor lies wholly or at all upon one side we do not believe and are not prepared to admit; yet such seems to be the generally received impression. Granted that the theatres advertise, and that their advertisements, especially in the case of weekly journals, form an important item of income. We contend that the money spent in advertising brings itself back ten fold in audiences, and, as a general thing, pays the manager more surely than any other expense which he incurs in the conduct of his business. Supposing, for instance, that a theatre pays THE CALIFORNIAN five dollars a week for an advertisement, which, with an attending theatrical notice, goes before three thousand city readers: if five are induced to go through the advertisement he gets his money back; if ten, he doubles it. Where rests the obligation then?

"Yes," but theatres are obliged to admit editors and critics free, they are crushed to death by dead-heads! Here again we take issue. It is enough for the critic to be bored in being compelled to sit or stand a play through, without having to pay for the "privilege." To pay the regular admission price would leave the balance of patronage at the end of the week on the theatrical ledger, and who would then be benefited? So far as the daily papers are concerned, the critic's work in this city seems to be a labor of love; after making up the news for the morning, supervising the telegrams, and writing an editorial or two, he is expected to saunter into the theatre just before the curtain is rung down on the last act, and, peering over the heads and hats of the entire house, frame an intelligent opinion of the play. That criticism under these circumstances does not attain very high growth as an Art is scarcely to be wondered at. In New York the theatrical and musical department is a regular and a recognised one, and a critic is paid for attending to it, that being his sole duty on the paper; it never occurs to the metropolitan manager that the critic is rather an excrescence upon the theatrical body than otherwise; on the contrary, on the production of each new play two seats are regularly sent to the recognized critic of each paper. He is not expected to stand in a remote corner of the house, catching fragments of the dialogue interlarded with strange oaths audible in the lobby, or to climb over the shoulders of a score of honest but not transparent coal-heavers, in order to witness the ghost in Hamlet or testify to the murder in Macbeth. In the matter of advertising is it not the manager who is favored? for no man is deputed from a newspaper office to examine the dry goods merchant's calicos, sample the grocery man's sugar, or test the apothecary's drugs, and expound their virtues to the public.

Perhaps the reason of the ill-favor into which critics have come upon this coast arises from the fact that intelligent criticism has never been attempted and that consequently its value has never come to be understood and appreciated by either managers or the public. The system of puffing everything indiscriminately, for the sake of securing the advertising patronage, has prevailed to such an extent that newspaper notices have come to mean nothing and possess no positive value whatever. Lying before us—the subject is too grave to admit even the suspicion of a play upon words—is a journal which has persistently praised everything and everybody on the stage during the past two years; which has never uttered a word in condemnation of the occasional nonsense foisted upon the public as "drama," or a word of censure to the incompetent actor who does not know, or, knowing, cannot render his part. Glancing over the column we find simply a gathering together of all the adjectives expressive of excellence or admiration, positive, comparative and superlative, which the language affords. We select at random; "charming assumptions," "contagious laughter," "irrepressibly humorous," "enthusiastically received," "illustrious artists," "unflagging spirit," "grand solemnity," (sacred concert) "bright particular star," "inimitable entertainments," "screaming farce," "pristine success," "culmination of uproarious sport," "indefatigable manager," "harmonious perfection," "studious care," "capable combination"—two mortal columns of unqualified praise and puffery of everything from melodeons up the ascending gamut which ends with the Keans, and not a word of criticism or a sensible line of suggestion in all.

We maintain that this style of thing is unjust to managers, to actors, to the public, but chiefly to the profession to which the journal in question claims to belong. Neither managers nor actors have any inducement to exert themselves when, under any circumstances, they are sure to be smothered beneath a feather-bed of puffery; the public comes to regard with suspicion the style of art under which this laying on of profuse color, indiscriminately, with a whitewash brush, as it were, seems to obtain; and other journals must share in the disgrace and cheapness which this practice brings upon the profession.

If asthmatic puffery, which we here take occasion to denounce, is to be pursued to the end, we suggest the use of some such blank as the following—leaving simply the names and dates to be filled out:

The ———, after completing an unprecedentedly successful run of ——— days and ——— hours, on ——— evening last, was then withdrawn to give place to ———, one of ———'s most brilliant dramas, which will probably prove the piece de resistance for the next nine months. Language fails to do justice either to this conglomeration of perfection or the manner in which it was put upon the stage. The mise en scene was perfect, winning the frequent applause of a large and very intelligent audience, who gave cordial proofs of approbation during its progress. Fascinating Miss ——— added laurels to the chaplets which already wreathed her histrionic and classic brow. Mrs. ———, by her charming divertissement, enraptured everybody, and inoculated them with contagious laughter. Mr. ———, who has just returned from a highly successful tour through ——— and the islands, where he received the highest civic and social honors, was the bright particular star of the occasion. Mr. ———, the gentlemanly and indefatigable prompter, put the right words into the actors' mouths at precisely the right moment, while Mr. ———, the promising call-boy, displayed a talent quite in accordance with his pristine success. Mr. ——— did well his part in removing the chairs and tables, and too much praise cannot be awarded to the nimble-kneed Mr. ———, who worked the trap-doors. Too much praise cannot be awarded to the elegant ushers, who seated everybody according to the seats they had previously paid for; while the irrepressible and enterprising manager should reap a harvest of several millions of dollars from this exquisite piece-de-resistance which he has so charmingly put upon his delightful stage.

If any one think that in the foregoing pre-Raphaelite notice we have aught exaggerated, we can only refer them to the living record which one of our cotemporaries furnishes.

As to the dead-head privileges so much talked about and of which some journals profess to feel ashamed, manifesting a morbid desire to pay for sitting some intolerably stupid piece through, in order to avoid the constraint of feeling obliged to furnish favorable notices, we do not see them at all in any such unreasonable light. We know of at least one manager in this city, who never objects to the most searching criticism if it bear honesty upon its face. And this truth is patent: a member of the press seldom or never crowds any one else out; there is such an abundance of room that turning a single auditor away from the doors is unheard of, and the critic cheats the house of no paid for seat, since, if not obliged to go in a professional capacity, the chances are that he would not go at all. In the generality of cases he simply fills a vacant seat, and for that seat, if the play be at all worthy of commendation, and he manage his pen sensibly and honestly enough to ensure respect for its utterances, he pays by sending scores, perhaps hundreds, to fill seats the next night. If all managers knew that by attempting to dictate by their advertising patronage as to what should and what should not be said in newspaper notices, they robbed notices of all power to do them any good, they would surely lend their best endeavors to foster careful and conscientious criticism. The world moves, and that a better state of things in this respect will at no late day obtain in San Francisco, we hope and believe.

A LOSING GAME.—The game which the South has been playing for the past three years and more can be very aptly illustrated by a "little story" which appeared in the New York Times when the war-clouds first began to lower. It was then told as indicative of the result which would follow the persistent desire of the South to "buck" against the North:

"Some years since a Southern gentleman visited the North for the purpose of seeing the lions and fighting the tiger.

"He tried the tiger and didn't like it, and thought he'd take a shy at a game familiar to him by name only, called roulette. One turn of roulette, you know, makes the whole world kin! He started out in quest of the game, only knowing that roulette had something to do with roll, but entirely ignorant whether the roll were a French or a Dutch one. On the first corner he met a barrel-organ man grinding away for dear life. He was turning as though he had only a few minutes to turn in, and didn't want to die before his work was complete. The tune was 'The Bold Privateer.'

"Our Georgian friend thought he'd found the game. Stepping briskly up, he laid a dollar-bill down on the box. The organ man's eyes opened, he bagged the bill, and ground away with renewed vigor. Our Georgian thought he had lost, and 'doubled up,' laying down a two-dollar bill. That was bagged, and the barrel of the organ went whirling round as though there were several devils inside.

"To make a long story short, the thing went on, and again and again the Georgian 'doubled up,' the organ-grinder pocketing the money all the time, until he had 'nary' another dollar left. But he didn't complain. As he saw the last of his currency bagged by the delighted organ-grinder, he simply remarked:

"Well, of all the games I ever bucked against, that is the dogdarnest! I guess I'll jump it;' and he left."

If in the light of recent successes to Northern arms, the South has not concluded that the game of rebellion they are playing is very much like "bucking" against a hand-organ, and that the sooner they "jump the game," they are very hard to be convinced. For they have "doubled up" repeatedly, losing every time, and the moment is now nearly at hand when, not having a "stake" left, they are to be "doubled up" in the slang interpretation of the phrase.

A VALUABLE PAPER.—The Sacramento Union of Monday last came to its readers as a double sheet, containing within the eight pages of that number more valuable information, probably, than any other newspaper published on this continent. It furnished a complete abstract of the notable events of the year, a State record, as well as a local one compiled for the city and county where the paper is published—not a day in the year has been permitted to escape without having its record chalked down in a nutshell. It also contains all the marriages, births and deaths in Sacramento for the year, arranged in chronological order; together with careful and complete statistics of everything of interest to the Californian reader, from stage routes to the proceedings of the higher Courts. We question whether any other journal, daily or weekly, in or out of the Union, gave its readers so full and valuable a compendium of the local events of the year for a New Year's gift, or came nearer to furnishing a practical idea of what a newspaper should be, than the Sacramento Union of the date to which we refer.

SAILED.—Capt. R. L. Ogden, better known to the initiated as "Podgers," long time acting Quartermaster at this Post as well as confidential correspondent of the New York Times, and constant contributor to THE CALIFORNIAN both with pen and purse, sailed from these scenes of former usefulness in the steamer Constitution on Wednesday last—i. e. he would have sailed had the Constitution been a ship; as it was he steamed away, as an esteemed citizen should. Ducks and snipe will be glad of his absence and the fish in the bay will probably hold high carnival over his departure and escort him as far as the Golden Gate, for he was given to the gun and rod, and chastised them heavily. He goes to New York, where his family have already preceded him, and thence to Europe for a summering; so people may expect to hear of a sensation in the Boulevards, and perhaps a tandem team at Longchamps. Of Podger's journeyings our readers will find chronicles in further Leaves from his Journal, which he promised to send when he took leave of us.

"ENQUIRER" writes to know whether the beverage called egg-nogg belongs to Christmas Day or to New Years, and whether Great Expectations has been played in San Francisco. So far as the egg-nogg is concerned, our researches have convinced us that that it is a relic of the barbarous ages, invented to bring confusion to the confiding creatures who drink it. As a poison it is perhaps slower than strychnine, but equally sure; people have been known to drink it and live, but the majority who tippie on it die young, and their demise is not to be attributed to the liking of the gods. The Dashaways do not encourage drinking in any form, but if the President of that excellent institution had to drink or die he would probably choose plain whiskey. Egg-nogg, however, is called a Christmas drink. Great Expectations has been dramatized; it was played in Barnum's Museum, New York, some two years since, but it has never been imported to this coast. Great Expectations were played out in San Francisco last year, when the mining stock market went down.

A MATHEMATICAL PUZZLE.—The following is decidedly the neatest little mathematical puzzle that ever came to our notice. It occupied the attention of one of the Clubs, the other evening, until a late hour, and some of the members are said to be puzzling over it yet: A man has 60 apples; he sells 30 for 15 cents, which is a half-cent apiece, or 2 apples for 1 cent. He sells the remaining 30 for 10 cents, which is a third of a cent apiece, or 3 apples for 1 cent. Thus we see that for 5 apples he gets 2 cents; now how many cents does he get for 60 apples? The problem seems plain enough, and the rule of three gives the immediate result of 24. But, on the other hand, if he gets 15 cents for 30 of his apples, and 10 cents for the remaining 30, it seems pretty evident that he gets 25 for the 60. It is said to be a poor rule that won't work both ways, but this one seems utterly to refuse to. Nevertheless, the solution of the problem is easy; who will reconcile both its seemingly conflicting ends?

SOCRATES being asked the way to honest fame, said: "study to be what you wish to seem!"

DRAMATIC MENTION.

THE hand of the enchanter has been laid upon Maguire's Opera House during the week, turning the stage into a forest wherein the Bear, the Eagle and the Dolphin disported themselves right merrily. A dolphin in a forest seems at first thought something like a fish out of water, but it must be remembered that this was an Enchanted Forest, and anomalies are in order where magic rules. The piece is an extravaganza, abounding, of course, in puns which startle one by their atrocity if not by their novelty. The story is of a Count—"Count Wulfield," rather impoverished by free living, who, venturing to hunt in the Enchanted Forest, forfeits his life to "Prince Bruin," "Prince Eagle" and "Prince Dolphin," respectively, by slaying a hare, shooting at a bird, and catching a fish. They release him and give him gold and pearls on condition that he gives them his daughters to wife. The nuptials are consummated after some little ado, and the brides go away with their husbands. The Count's son, a handsome young fellow, after a while goes out in search of his sisters, and finally finds them, but comes very near furnishing his relatives with a dinner, as his brothers-in-law are moved by their appetites to eat him. In the end, however, he discovers that they are under the spell of a wicked magician, who also has a pretty sister of theirs in his power. The young Count delivers her and marries her, and the whole finishes with a grand tableau. Prince Bruin was played by Mr. Hill, who exhibited a bear skin to the audience with perfect coolness; Prince Eagle was personated by Mr. Ruby, who made a remarkably fine-looking bird, barring a slight disarrangement of the tail-feathers, while Mr. Aldrich turned out as Prince Dolphin—a nice fresh-looking fish. Mr. Wheatleigh was Count Wulfield; we must be pardoned for saying that he does not appear to very eminent advantage in burlesque, since in that very declaration we pay him a compliment as an actor. Mrs. Saunders, as the captious Countess, was capital. Mrs. Perry made up excellently as the young Count, playing her part with that easy grace and abandon which have made her the favorite she is. The brides of earth, air and sea were personated by Miss Martin, Miss Land and Miss Howard; a change would seem to have been desirable in the above distribution, giving Land to the Bear while Martin went to the Air. Miss Deaderick, as the released Princess, fully justified Mrs. Perry's willingness to risk life and everything but limb in the attempt to set her free. The multitude picked the puns out of the piece as children might plums from a pudding, and were equally as avid in swallowing them.

In the farce of My Preserver, which precluded The Enchanted Forest, Mr. Wheatleigh displayed that capacity for a nice delineation of character on which his reputation is founded. The piece, moreover, is an excellent one, its plot turning on the romantic determination of a young heiress to marry her "preserver," who has fished her out of a horse pond. "Here is where the nonsense comes in!" She thinks in the first place that it is "William Bury," (Frank Mayo) who has rescued her, whereas it is "Bilberry," (Mr. Wheatleigh) the former having only played second fiddle in the duct of preservation. William Bury is a handsome fellow, while Bilberry—mark how artfully the names are compounded—is an awkward clodpole. Bilberry manifests a willingness to jilt his old sweetheart "Dolly," (Mrs. Edwin) in order to marry the rich young lady, while William Bury, on the other hand, is indignant at his Dulcinea's determination to stick by her original declaration to marry her preserver—after seeing him. A deal of confusion occurs, furnishing an opportunity for some excellent acting and much fun. As Dolly, Mrs. Edwin was so quietly comic as to confirm us in the belief we have hitherto entertained, that the pathetic is not her strongest suit. To say that all the characters were well rendered is to save the trouble of individualizing. It is a pity that pieces after My Preserver's pattern are not more plenty on the stage.

Mr. Lawlor's benefit on Wednesday evening was crowded, the house netting him a sum assuredly commensurate with his deserts, estimating them at even a very high figure. Eight hundred dollars in gold is not a bad thing to go to the States with. Hamlet was the play, and Mr. Lawlor was the "Prince," Mrs. Jordan appearing as "Ophelia." We refrain from criticism, as it will be sufficient to say that the Keans, instead of remaining in town to benefit by the performance, chose to go to Sacramento and give readings.

The Keans, who have lately been giving dramatic readings at Sacramento, commence an engagement at the Opera House on Monday evening; they will play four evenings during the week, and it is the last opportunity, probably that Californians will have of seeing these artists—at least within the Golden Gate. Beyond this announcement, it is unnecessary to say anything; seats are already engaged in advance for the entire engagement.

The law refusing to allow theatrical representations on Sunday evening, Mr. Maguire thought he would treat the public to a little solemn music, and accordingly tried the experiment of a Sacred Concert last Sunday evening at the Academy. The concert was an excellent one, and if it did not pay, the public were at fault, for certainly the manager manifested a kindly regard for seventh day proprieties in its institution. But as a general thing, people given to sacred music go to church on Sunday evenings, where it is dispensed gratuitously if not artistically. But we believe the experiment is to be tried again; so that the Academy will come to be known, so far as Sunday entertainments are concerned, as the Academy of Sacred Music.

The Hippodrome at the Mechanics' Fair Pavilion draws as though the manager had lines stretching from the popular coat-tails to his horses' tails, and tugged audiences in whether or no. He has struck the element of novelty and sensation in the chariot races, which are probably only inferior in interest and excitement to the chariot races which of old crowded the Roman amphitheatres with delighted spectators. We are sorry to say it, but we have reason to believe that very many people go in the expectation that an accident may occur—and it would be such fun to see a woman "spilled." The other attractions will be seen by reference to our advertising columns.

Mrs. Jordan takes her farewell benefit prior to her departure for the Atlantic States at Maguire's Opera House, this evening. The piece of the occasion is Aurora Floyd, in which Mrs. Jordan as the heroine won her first success, and for once established the Metropolitan on a paying basis, drawing full houses to that chronically-unfortunate establishment for nearly a fortnight. Mr. Frank Lawlor, who in the character of "John Mellish," also contributed to the Metropolitan's success, appears in the cast this evening, as well as Mr. Charles Wheatleigh, Mr. Frank Mayo, Mrs. H. A. Perry, Mrs. C. R. Saunders, and all the legitimate company. With such a cast, the performance can but prove an admirable one, affording the public an opportunity to get their money back as well as to compliment a clever and accomplished actress. Mrs. Jordan leaves on the 13th, Mr. Frank Lawlor, Miss Annette Ince and sister, Mrs. Woodward and Mrs. Leighton, going on the same steamer. There seems to be what we may alliteratively term a histrionic hegira among the members of the profession, as Frank Mayo, Wambold, Bacchus, Peel and others are "up" for departure in February.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

WE are indebted to Roman for a number of books which were "new" when they came to our desk, though the exigencies of the holidays have compelled us to defer a notice of them until they can scarcely come under that head now. John Godfrey's Fortunes, by Bayard Taylor, we read carefully through, from curiosity to see how the poet appeared as a novelist, quite as much as from a sense of duty. The book is simple as the story told to amuse a child, making no pretensions apparently to plot, and avoiding all the dramatic elements of which novelists generally avail themselves. And yet we read the volume through with interest and laid it down with regret. This interest arises, we fancy, from the very simplicity with which the book is written, and the conviction it somehow carries with it of being an autobiography. Had the author at the close declared of the story that it was all true, and that all the experiences narrated therein had been his, the reader would instinctively have believed him, while on the other hand an indignant disclaimer would probably be put in did the author declare his work to be wholly and purely fiction. To conceal art is the perfection of art, and accordingly we give Mr. Taylor a credit which those who believe that in John Godfrey's he tells the story of his own fortunes, will be slow to accord him. It is rather to be regretted that the episode of Jane Berry was introduced, since, aside from being so improbable as to border upon the verge of the elements which sentimental writers depend upon, it is also inartistic, not at all in keeping with the character of the story, and scarcely assisting in its denouement. The book will repay perusal.

The Seer is a collection of Leigh Hunt's charming essays, contributed to the London Journal, the Liberal, the Monthly Repository, the Tatler and the Round Table, the author furnishing the date of their first publication in book form in the following note to the preface: "Given at our suburban abode, with a fire on one side of us and a vine at the window on the other, this nineteenth day of October, one thousand eight hundred and forty, and in the very green and invincible years of our life, the fifty-sixth." The second title of the book is Common-places Refreshed, and this expresses the nature of the essays better than the first, for the subjects are taken from every-day life; snatched from the breakfast-table, the meadow, the strawberry-patch, the snuff-box. The author literally finds a sermon in stones, discoursing easily and gracefully upon "A Pebble." The book is a beautiful specimen of typography, both in paper and binding, the illuminated title page reminding one of the old Roman missals.

In Eliana we have those essays of the "Gentle Elia," which Talfourd thought best to omit in the standard edition of his works. The present editor, however, thinks that: "The King's chaff is as good as other people's corn," and truly remarks that the admirers of Elia want to possess every serap and fragment of his inditing. They cannot let oblivion have the least "notelet" or "essaykin." For however inferior to his best productions these uncollected articles may be, they surely contain more or less of Lamb's humor, sense, and observation. Certain it is, that any one of them would make a sensation if published in a modern magazine. There is a nameless and indelible charm about all of Lamb's writings which captivates and entravishes his readers, and for this service which he has done in reproducing these waifs, the editor of Eliana deserves a vote of thanks from reading electors, if not a medal.

Mrs. Jameson's Sacred and Legendary Art is published in two beautiful "blue and gold" volumes—a species of embalmment which Ticknor and Fields some time since invented. To attain the distinction of "blue and gold" is now to an author what the decoration of ribbons and crosses was to Knights of old. In conferring this honor upon Mrs. Jameson the publishers have done wisely, for not only to the lingerer on the threshold of Art does her work commend itself, but it also is valuable to those who stand within the doors of the Temple, enabling them to read the spirit which moved the composition of the old masters and spoke in their colorings, as well as to appreciate the mechanical touch which guided the pencil. A better preparation for a visit to the great galleries of the world than a study of these two little volumes could not be recommended.

The Essays, Moral, Political and Aesthetic, of Herbert Spencer, well worthy of purchase and perusal at any time, are specially adapted to the present, when our political system is convulsed to its centre and a new order of things is coming to replace the old. Adapted to the latitude of England though these essays are, the limitation is only apparent, for the discussions strike through the examples and illustrations chosen from English history to principles of universal moment and applicability.

Of Pollard's Southern History of the War we have the third volume. It was unnecessary for the author to explain in the "introduction" that he sought no literary ornament and attempted no high standard of historical composition, for this becomes evident to the reader on every page of the work. Mr. Pollard furnishes very much the ex parte history that that might be expected from the editor of a daily newspaper, accustomed to color statements and tone facts to suit the hot prejudices of the people to whom he looks for support. President Lincoln is termed a "Yankee monster of inhumanity and falsehood," the Southern soldiers are in all instances credited with courage and chivalry, while the Federals, under the pet name of "Yankees," are held up as the embodiment of all that is cruel, cowardly and treacherous in human nature. When a proper history of this war is written it will be by no pen previously steeped in all the passions and prejudices that have actuated the popular mind on either side, but by some cool, dispassionate observer of events, who stands aloof from the whirlpool and calmly weighs men and motives in the even balance of justice. Still, Mr. Pollard's work has a certain value as being an extreme view of the rebellion and its virtues, furnished by the hand of one of its supporters and admirers.

The Merchant Melancholic, by Mary A. Howe, opening at a time when "Night's sable plumage, uplifted from the face of the broad Atlantic, was giving place to the gray pinions of dawn," will probably find readers who admire that style of writing, but plain people, who like the flavor of crisp, comprehensible English, will not be much tempted to follow the story to the end.

Dora Darling: The Daughter of the Regiment, is a juvenile book, the more adapted to interest the class of readers for whom it is intended from the fact that it tells of the war now progressing, and sounds in young ears the scream of life and rattle of drums which all children delight in. Dora went to the wars and became a virandiere; her adventures are pleasantly told, the only evil, we fear, being that other little girls may be tempted by the sweets of her experience to slip surreptitiously away from home and become daughters of regiments, too.

Bancroft publishes a "Pocket Diary for 1865," a very useful memorandum book, and also The Pacific Almanac, for the present year. The "Diary" contains much useful memoranda, and some excellent tables of reference, the only thing that tempts us to doubt the reliability of the latter being the fact that the compiler has left THE CALIFORNIAN out from the list of "newspapers published in San Francisco." But the form is very convenient, and altogether the work is very creditable. The Pacific Almanac is in the usual style of those useful if not interesting works, adapted, as the name indicates, to the wants of the Pacific coast.

WHOEVER is honorable and candid, honest and courteous, is a true gentleman, whether learned or unlearned, rich or poor.

MOST men like a spirit of self-sacrifice in their friends a great deal better than in themselves.

MY ADVENTURES IN ALGERIA.

AT the end of a rapid descent from a respectable social position in England—at least, I supposed it must necessarily be the end; there could scarcely be a lower deep—I found myself one fine day full private in the French Foreign Legion, serving in Algeria, and comrade to a set of the vilest scamps, with but few exceptions—the refuse, in fact, of every nation in Europe—that ever disgraced the profession of arms, and at that time (1840) attached to the command of General Lamoriciere. How this came about will not require long to tell. The terrible tragedy was comprised in one act.

I belonged to a good family, known for many centuries in the north of England, which had gone to decay. In other words I was poor, but a gentleman. Let us not laugh; it is something to be a gentleman, even in that sorry sense of the word, comparatively speaking. I was an orphan too, and had been one from childhood: a benevolent relative supplied the requisite funds for giving me a first rate education, and I graduated, not without some distinction, at Cambridge. But I had no home. The vacations I passed at the University; and every one at all conversant with the life of young men relieved to a great extent from academic control, will understand its pernicious effect upon me, a youth of fiery, impulsive temperament, and at whose heart was ever festering a rankling sense of wrong, of bitter resentment that I, the representative of a family which had ranked amongst the best gentry of the county of Durham, should be a pauper, dependent for the very means of education upon the bounty of a distant relative, one whose father had amassed wealth in trade, and by that all-potent agency thrust himself, as it were, into our ancient, worm-eaten family. Folly! madness! you will say: no doubt of it; but not the less for that passion of my soul. My ancient name did me other disservice besides filling my mind with vain, profitless regrets, causing me to be forever looking back into the past, instead of forward to the future. It was concluded that the family bearing such a well-known name must be rich, at least sufficiently so to pay the debts of its representative, however large and thickly laid on. My credit consequently was really unlimited, and I milked the cow till the blood came; which crisis arriving, I bolted, taking with me the bills which for some reason or other (I fancy my creditor's suspicions had been aroused by some anonymous hints through the post from Tom Carlton, an intimate chum of mine, whom I had beaten a few days before in a sculling boat-race) were suddenly rained on me in a pelting shower, and a very respectable package they made. I left Cambridge without beat of drum, and in four or five days (travelling in 1834 was not so rapid as in 1864) I presented myself before the distant relative who had supplied funds for my education. He received me kindly enough, and somewhat emboldened by that kindness of manner I unfolded my budget; that is, I untied the parcel and spread the heap of little bills before his astonished eyes. Heavens! how the good man stared!—he was a good man in his (looking at it from my own point of view) straitened, narrow-minded way. Finally, he peremptorily refused to liquidate such outrageous liabilities even in part; then gravely, gently, firmly—suaviter in modo, fortiter in re—said the time was come when I must make my own way in the world. I was young, vigorous in mind and body, had received an excellent education, and could not fail, with courage and constancy, to find a field for the profitable exercise of those gifts and acquirements. All he could further do for me was to present me with a cheque for two hundred pounds, a sum quite sufficient for affording me time to look about me and select a path in life. I left an hour afterwards, carrying with me my relative's blessing and his cheque.

As the father of mischief would have it, instead of proceeding direct to London as I first intended—though Heaven only knows what, even in my then excited state of mind might have befallen me there—I determined to pay a flying visit to Mr. Whitborne, an old friend of my family's. I did so; was received with the utmost cordiality, and found his daughter Emily, who dwelt in my remembrance as a little fairy, blue-eyed, auburn-haired child, developed into a charming, beautiful girl, radiant in the golden light of her eighteenth summer. Of course I fell in love with her, and equally certain it is that she coquetted unmercifully with me, being at the very time engaged to one Pemberton—Augustus Pemberton, the only son of a wealthy merchant, who had a sort of shooting box in the neighborhood. He was absent when I paid my visit to Mr. Whitborne, and would not return for three or four weeks, during which I dwelt in the seventh heaven. My descent was sudden, sheer, headlong. Mr. Pemberton arrived; preparations for the wedding were at once and openly commenced; Mr. Whitborne invited me to be present thereat, and when, tossed in a tempest of passion, I ventured to remonstrate with Emily Whitborne, she stared at me as if I wanted her to construe a problem in Euclid, and with a light, silvery laugh asked half-seriously if I had been taking wine so early in the day. This occurred in the garden, and as I turned to leave her, maddened with the pangs of despised love, I encountered Pemberton, a sarcastic, mocking smile upon his lips. This was too much; the already brimming cup overflowed; in the madness of the moment I flew at him like a wild beast; and, being a more powerful man than he, so punished him before Miss Whitborne's cries brought him help, that the wedding would, I was sure, be necessarily postponed. That was something; and in a few minutes I had left the place for ever, shaking its dust from off my feet.

I came to the wise resolution of gratifying a wish I had long entertained—namely, that of seeing Paris—before addressing myself to the business of the world. Accordingly, I took coach for Dover, crossed over to Calais, and engaged a seat on the coupé of a diligence for Paris. In the coupé travelled with me M. Adolphe Grignan, a captain the Chasseurs d'Afrique, absent on temporary leave, and who after a stay in Paris would rejoin his regiment at Oran. He was a very gentlemanly man, about thirty I guessed: we were mutually pleased with each other's society, and during the few days he remained in Paris we were inseparable. His description of Algeria, its scenery, picturesque populations, blue Italian skies, health-giving climate, interested, enchanted me; and when he hinted that he had no doubt I should be able to find congenial employment—for I had been perfectly frank with him as to my position and prospects in life—in the families of superior French officials domiciled in Algiers, where the means of obtaining first-class instruction were very scanty, I with some hesitation determined upon accepting his invitation to accompany him thither.

The French occupation at Algiers, as might have been expected, shows to greatest advantage in the metropolis of their new possession, so easily accessible from Toulon and Marseilles. The bustle on the quay and in the steep narrow streets, the hurrying to and fro, and Babel hubbub of the motley population, Frenchmen, Moors, Arabs, Negroes, Kabyles, Jews, and showily attired, jewelled Jewesses, whose lustrous Eastern eyes are after all their brightest ornaments, present a scene at once novel, striking, and picturesque; and although the vigorous commercial life everywhere pulsating around is necessarily in a great degree factitious—factitious in the sense applicable to all numerously garrisoned towns—you will not have been on shore ten minutes before feeling quite convinced that the contest going on between Asia and Europe on North African soil is already virtually decided, at least so far as the capital of Algeria is concerned.

The immediate environs, too, are charming. I know of no more glorious prospect than that obtained from the summit of Le Sahal, to which I strolled with my friend Captain Grignan. One of the most splendid landscapes in the world is stretched out before you. Beauty breaks in everywhere, encircles you on all sides. The verdant, slightly undulating surface of the far eastward and westward extending hills is profusely dotted with white villa-like country houses, peeping out from amidst vine-gardens, orange and palm groves, bouquet-like clumps of pomegranate, jujube, cypress and almond trees; above is the deep, cloudless blue of Italian skies, and far below, murmuring at the base of Le Sahal and closing the distant horizon on the north, are the bright and calmly heaving waters of the Mediterranean, the fresh breeze from whence sensibly moderates the intense heat of summer. This was the Mohammedan's earthly paradise, and one can see, by the numerous epaulettes and silk dresses which glance and flutter through the openings in the trees and groves, that it is also the favorite resort of the gallant soldiers and gay dames of France. In one of those villas resided the family of a distinguished French officer, Colonel Coutraï, with whom Captain Grignan was personally acquainted. He did me the honor of introducing me to Madame Coutraï and the Colonel, who happened to be within, and who readily promised to forward the views of Captain Grignan's friend to the utmost extent of his power.

A few days afterwards Captain Grignan left for Oran to join his regiment there; and left alone, and the excitement of novelty gradually subsiding, I began to mope sadly. Promise, of pupils, never to be fulfilled, prevented me from returning at once to England; and as the devil, proverbially busy with idlers, prompted me to frequent several of those earthly outposts of his infernal dominions called gambling hells, the very rapid result was that I found myself with but a few francs left; even my watch was gone. Those few francs were spent in wine, and I awoke in the morning literally coinless. I had three alternatives before me: one to hang myself, the second to apply to the British Consul—that is, to be passed home as a pauper—or to enlist in the foreign legion. I chose the last alternative, was accepted, and resigned myself as well as I could to my evil destiny. I might certainly have applied to my friend Captain Grignan for the loan of a sufficient sum to procure me a passage to England, but reluctance to incur pecuniary obligation to a friend is the last sentiment of self-respect which lingers in the bosom of a man who has fallen—especially if by his own misconduct—from any of the little heights of society. I could not have done it.

I had always felt a strong inclination towards the military profession, an enthusiastic admiration of glory; but not the military profession as illustrated by the Foreign Legion, not war as waged by the French in Africa—a war of razzias, burnings, shutting up hundreds of poor devils in caves and smoking them to death. I have been a witness, nay, an actor, compelled to assist at deeds which to this day make me shudder with horror. It was a usual thing, whenever the General in command thought it politic to give the Kabyles a lesson, for the whole force to march out at midnight, and proceed without rest till the baying of dogs, the crowing of cocks, gave token that we were close upon a tribe; we then halted and prepared for immediate action. The heavy companies easily broke through the hedges of prickly pear which usually surround a Kabyle village, and the massacre began. Strict orders were always given to kill all the men, sparing only the women and children, whom the Kabyle tribes invariably ransomed, and those orders were rigorously carried out. I was present, too, in the Darah when, on the night of the 12th of June, 1844, a Kabyle tribe, in all about six hundred souls, closely pressed by the French under the command of Colonel Pelissier, the late Duke of Malakoff, took refuge in the holy cave of Tartani. There was no outlet to the cave, and starvation must soon have compelled them to accept the summons to surrender, to which at first they made no reply. But Pelissier had a military purpose in view, which delay might frustrate; and what, compared with the glory and the profit—a step, probably, in rank—were the lives of a few hundred wretched Arabs? He ordered an immense fire to be kindled at the mouth of the cave, and fed sedulously during the night with wood, grass, reeds, anything that would produce dense clouds of smoke, which the wind drove in whirling eddies into the mouth of the cave. The fire was well maintained during the night. When the day had fully dawned, the embers were kicked aside, and as soon as the air of the cave was breathable, soldiers were sent to ascertain how matters were within. They were gone but a few minutes, and had found all the Arabs, men, women, and children, dead; had beheld them lying just as death had found and left them; the old man grasping his gray beard; the younger one grim, rigid, stern as iron, with fanatic hatred and despair; the dead mother clasping her dead child with the steel gripe of the last agony, when all gave way but her strong love.

But enough of these horrors. I supped full of them during the five years I served with the Foreign Legion, in which distinguished corps I had the doubtful honor of attaining to the grade of Sous-Lieutenant. The adventure which alone dwells pleasantly in my memory, in relation to my sojourn in Algeria, is of a very different complexion.

The regiment in which I had served, having incurred more than ordinary loss in the field and by disease, was ordered to Algiers, to remain in garrison there till it again became, both as to members and health, fit for active service.

It was there that whilst sauntering one evening through the Place Marengo, I saw a paper in the shop window of one Isaacs, a jeweler, upon which was written in French, "Wanted a Preceptor, to teach a young lady the English language; he must be a Christian, and must speak French with fluency and correctness."

I at once entered the shop, where I found Isaacs and his son; told them I was a gentleman fully competent to perform the duty required, and should willingly undertake it if the hours of tuition could be reconciled with the exigencies of military duty, and the terms were sufficiently remunerative. The Jews looked at each other and askance at me. The uniform did not appear to please them. I knew both the Jews by reputation. They were converts to the Catholic faith—a speculation which had turned out a very profitable one, they being the only Christian Jews in Algiers. It may be prejudice—I dare say it is—but I have an invincible distrust of converted Jews. I hold, with the late Rev. Sydney Smith, that a converted Jew is like the blank leaf between the Old and New Testaments, separated from the Old and not belonging to the New. And there was nothing in the aspect or character of Isaacs senior or his son Benjamin to modify that distrust.

Presently the pair of worthies went to the further end of the shop and conversed together in low tones, eyeing me distrustfully the while. At last the old man, remarking to his son that there was no time to lose, came to me and said—he spoke in French—that there would be no difficulty about terms if I gave satisfaction; then asked what time I thought it would require to teach the young lady English; he did not mean perfectly, but tolerably well; that would suffice, as she would never have occasion to speak it, probably. I said that depended upon the young lady's capacity for acquiring languages. How old was she? "Eighteen next birthday, when she will be of age. I must tell you," continued Isaacs, "how the affair stands. The young girl, Mary Fanshawe, was born here in Algiers of English parents."

"Indeed! then she is an English girl, a subject of her Britannic Majesty, to all intents and purposes."

"That is the English law, I believe, but it is not the law here, and Mademoiselle Fanshawe is not in England—never will be, please God; she is a pious child, and has no wish to risk her precious soul by dwelling with heretics."

"You rascally old hypocrite! I should very much like to kick you," thought I. I, however, merely replied, "That is no concern of mine. My duty will be confined to teaching Mademoiselle Fanshawe the heretical language, if I have the honor to be engaged."

"Well, I suppose we must engage you, we are so pressed for time. Her father died when the child was only about three years old, that was in 1831, the year after the French came; Madame Fanshawe died in childbirth. Mr. Fanshawe made a serious will—that is to say, there are odd stipulations in it. One is that his daughter must be taught English, and not be married till she can speak that language. It is droll, but not the less true for that. Now the tuteur under the will and guardian of the young lady was Ben Mustapha, a rich, very rich diamond merchant, who died about three months ago, after nominating me tuteur and guardian in his stead. Ben Mustapha and M. Fanshawe were very great friends, brothers. They had met each other in Paris, I believe, where, by Mr. Fanshawe's persuasion, Mustapha like me embraced the Catholic faith. The French being masters in Algiers, there was nothing to fear. Well, Mustapha, I must say, neglected his duty as to having Mademoiselle Mary taught English, and we must make up for lost time. That is the affair, Monsieur; and I hope you will do your best, so that she may speak English tolerably, you know, on her next birthday, now about eight months distant."

I promised to do my best; the hours of tuition, terms, etc., were settled, and I left. The same evening I called upon a gentleman with whom I had some slight acquaintance, who was pretty sure to know something more about the Jew's English ward than Isaacs himself had chosen to tell me, and my curiosity was sharply whetted. I was right. The young lady's fortune, invested by her guardian Mustapha in diamonds, and transferred at his death to Isaacs, was very considerable, probably over twenty thousand pounds; and Benjamin Isaacs' son, it was confidently reported, would espouse Mary Fanshawe on her eighteenth birthday. Cunning Isaacs—father and son! Was it possible that I might make one in that pretty game? Mr. Charles Hibbert—a fine young fellow, who was staying with his mother at one of the villas on the Sahal (she had resided in Algeria for the benefit of her health several years), with whom I, with the freemasonry which attracts educated Englishmen to each other, was well acquainted—warmly urged me to go in and win. Surely a dirty, sallow Jew would not be a very formidable rival, etc., etc.

Miss Fanshawe was rather pretty, had nice hair and teeth, pretty good eyes, and her figure was tolerable; but mentally compared with Emily Whitborne—pshaw! Yes, but Miss Whitborne had long since become Mrs. Pemberton, whilst this prize, if not so desirable personally, was not only greatly superior to the Durham lady in les beaux yeux de sa casette, but was unappropriated. I should certainly go in for the prize.

And I had before long good hopes of winning; the first decided hint at possible success was a blushing request "that before either of the Isaacs I should avoid speaking or—acting in any way that might excite their suspicions, or I should not be allowed, as was now the case, to take her for a walk sometimes of a morning." At the same time I could not help noticing, with a kind of impatient resentment, that her demeanor towards Benjamin Isaacs was excessively tender, almost caressing; going to the verge, in fact, of the proprieties, supposing her to fully intend being his wife on her next birthday. Clever, no doubt, but it jarred harshly upon the chord of pride. Still, twenty thousand pounds in diamonds, in a box easily come-at-able, sealed with the French Syndic's seal, was worth having; to say nothing of escape from Algeria and the Foreign Legion. Probably, Mary Fanshawe feared that if she did not impress Benjamin Isaacs with an unshakable conviction that she doted upon him—and he was about as vain as he was ugly—that precious box would be placed where it would not be come-at-able. The young lady, I should have said, got on famously with her English. We could conjugate the verb "To love" very fluently together.

At last it was all settled. Charles Hibbert, who had been our confidant all along, and who felt a strong interest in the young lady, undertook to manage the final preparations, which merely consisted in obtaining of his mother a sufficient sum of ready coin to pay the passage money to England, with some twenty pounds over for current expenses after we had landed till the diamonds could be disposed of; and the hiring a boat to be in readiness to take us off from the beach and meet the steamer at sea—the want of passports being an insuperable obstacle to leaving from the port. My gentleman's clothes I took article by article to his mother's house, and there on the eventful morning I was to dress. The risk I must run was a serious one, for should I be arrested in plain clothes, and it could be proved that I intended bolting, my hermaphrodite grade of Sous-Officier would not save me from being shot. The morning came, and before sunrise I was in attendance beneath Mary's window, with a ladder, and with my friend and backer Charles on the look-out close by.

"Gently, gently, dear girl. Hush! I will guide your feet to the rungs of the ladder. You have the box quite safe?"

"Yes, mon cher, yes."

The descent was quietly accomplished, and I gave Mary

Fanshawe to the care of Charles Hibbert, whilst I ran off to change my dress. This was soon done; I asked Mrs. Hibbert, who had risen, to herself prepare a breakfast for me, in order not to place confidence, which might be betrayed, in a servant.

A glorious dawn came blushing over the sea as I hurried to the appointed spot. Arrived there—a slightly indented cove on the line of beach—no boat, no Mary Fanshawe, no Charles Hibbert could I see. I rubbed my eyes, and presently observed a note stuck in the cleft of a stick standing upright in the sand:

"My dear boy—all is fair in love and war. Mary unaccountably prefers me to you. Strange, but true. I think you had better lose no time in getting back to the barracks, or the consequences may be serious. Do not think I shall prove ungrateful for the treasure, in a double sense, which you have been the means of conferring upon me. Adieu, dear old boy. Mary and I shall often think of you."

"Yours faithfully,

CHARLES HIBBERT."

Indignation—rage—shame supplied me with momentary energy. I climbed to the summit of a ragged cliff overlooking the ocean, and saw that the boat containing the traitor and traitress was already at least a league at sea, and that Mary and her lover would in a few minutes be taken on board the steamer. Seeing me, they both rose in the boat, Hibbert waving his hat, Mary Fanshawe her handkerchief. Confusion!

I felt, however, amidst all my fury, that if I wished to live, if only for vengeance, I had not a moment to lose. I slid down the cliff and was hurrying at my best speed towards Mrs. Hibbert's, when, at a turn in the path, I found myself suddenly in the midst of at least a dozen Jews, Isaacs and his son foaming with rage, amongst them.

"That is he! that is the villain! Stop him!" screamed Isaacs. "Where is Mary? where are the jewels—the diamonds—the rubies? Give them to me, or I will strangle you—stamp you in the mud. Give them to me now, this moment!"

"Yes, yes; this moment!" howled Benjamin. "And where is my wife that was to be? Where is Mary? Tell me, or I will have your blood!"

I broke away and ran on at my top speed, followed like a fox by the hungriest of packs, and all giving tongue furiously. I saw that it was all over with me, and made for the nearest corps-de-garde. "These men are pursuing and abusing me. I know not why. It cannot concern them that I am not in uniform."

"He has stolen five hundred thousand francs in jewels," screamed Isaacs. "He has stolen my wife," howled Benjamin. The other Jews joined in chorus. It was a complete Babel.

"The situation is a very serious one," said Captain Grignan, who had hastened from Oran directly he heard of what had befallen me. "Mrs. Hibbert is in despair. We have interested Colonel Contrai in your favor, and he is now gone to see Lamoriciere. But I doubt that anything can be done. It is sad, very sad. To die in the field is nothing, but this—and the fine fellow's eyes overflowed with tears. "The court-martial is appointed to take place to-morrow—a mere formality."

The court-martial, presided over by Colonel Poiton, was constituted, and the merely formal proceedings were about to commence, when the roll of a drum and the presenting of arms was heard outside.

"The General Lamoriciere!"

The members of the court rose at the entrance of the General, who held some open papers in his hand.

"Sous-Lieutenant Bertie," (this was the name in which I had enlisted,) said Lamoriciere, in his brusque tone, "Sous-Lieutenant Bertie's term of enlistment for six years expired the very day previous to that when he attempted to leave Algeria. He was then, consequently, no longer a soldier of France. He is discharged! Let the secretary record the finding and the reason for it." The General threw the papers on the table and passed out.

In England once more; as poor, nay, poorer than when I left. When passing through London, I bethought me of inquiring if any letters had arrived there to my address during the last six years, as before leaving Durham for the last time, I had requested several friends, if they had anything of importance to communicate, to write to me at the post office at the West End, to be left till called for. The clerk, a very obliging person, strange to say, listened patiently to my explanation; said it would require some time to make a search extending over six years, but he would do so, and let me know the result on the morrow.

I called, and he placed four letters in my hand, all from the same person. Was I awake? had I lost my senses? A rich, aged, miserly relative, with whom, however, I had been always a sort of a favorite, was dead, and had bequeathed me the whole of his wealth! Again, Emily Whitborne was still Emily Whitborne. Some quarrel had taken place between her and Mr. Pemberton, in consequence of my assault upon that gentleman; the match was at once broken off, and it was thought Miss Whitborne would never be married.

I felt choked—dizzy—going mad; and but for the timely assistance of a police officer, who thought I was tipsy, should have fallen on the pavement.

The winter of life was past; summer was come, and in due season came the singing of birds—tiniest and prettiest of warblers, to whom Emily and I are never tired of listening.—English Magazine.

F U N I A N A .

"The mortality among Byron's mistresses," said the late Lady A., is really alarming. I think he generally buries, in verse, a first love every fortnight." "Madam," replied Curran, "mistresses are not so mortal. The fact is, my lord weeps for the press, and wipes his eyes with the public."

A CERTAIN physician was so fond of administering medicine that, seeing all the vials and pill-boxes of his patient completely emptied, and ranged in order on the table, he said: "Ah, sir, it gives me pleasure to attend you—you deserve to be ill."

A PERSON who dined in company with Dr. Johnson endeavored to make his court to him by laughing immoderately at everything he said. The doctor bore it for some time with philosophical indifference; but the impertinent "ha! ha! ha!" becoming intolerable: "Pray, sir," said the doctor, "what is the matter? I hope I have not said anything that you can comprehend."

A GENTLEMAN talking with his gardener, expressed his admiration at the rapid growth of the trees: "Why, yes, sir," says the man; "please to consider that they have nothing else to do."

LAMB and Coleridge were talking together on the incidents of Coleridge's early life, when he was beginning his career in the Church, and Coleridge was describing some of the facts in his usual tone, when he paused, and said: "Pray, Mr. Lamb, did you ever hear me preach?" "I never heard you do anything else!" said Lamb.

A CERTAIN Lord Mayor, hearing of a gentleman who had had the small-pox twice, and died of it, asked if he died the first time or the second?

A CREDITOR, whom he was anxious to avoid, met Sheridan coming out of Pall Mall. There was no possibility of avoiding him, but he did not lose his presence of mind. "That's a beautiful mare you are on!" said Sheridan. "Do you think so?" "Yes, indeed! how does she trot?" The creditor, highly flattered, put her in full trot. Sheridan bolted round the corner, and was out of sight in a moment.

"I NEVER was ruined but twice," said a wit; "once when I lost a lawsuit, and once when I gained one."

THE late Judge C. one day had occasion to examine a witness who stammered very much in delivering his testimony. "I believe," said his lordship, "you are a very great rogue." "Not so great a rogue as you, my lord—t-t-take me to be."

A COUNTRYMAN took his seat at a tavern table opposite to a gentleman who was indulging in a bottle of wine. Supposing the wine to be common property, our unsophisticated country friend helped himself to it with the gentleman's glass. "That's cool!" exclaimed the owner of the wine, indignantly. "Yes," replied the other, "I should think there was ice in it."

DURING a recent representation of King Lear at a metropolitan theatre, an old gentleman from the country, who was visibly affected by the pathos of some of the scenes, electrified the house by roaring out, "Mr. manager! Sir! Alter the play! I didn't pay my money to be made wretched in this way. Give us something funny, or I'll summon you, sir!"

"Tom," said a colonel to one of his men, "how can so good and brave a soldier as you get drunk so often?" "Colonel," replied he, "how can you expect all the virtues that adorn the human character for sixpence a day?"

THEODORE HOOK being in company, where he said something humorous in rhyme to every person present, on Mr. Winter, the late Solicitor of Taxes, being announced, made the following impromptu:

"Here comes Mr. Winter, collector of taxes,

I advise you to give him whatever he axes;

I advise you give it without any slumery,

For though his name's Winter his actions are summary."

TOM bought a gallon of gin to take home; and by way of a label, wrote his name upon a card, which happened to be the seven of clubs, and tied it to the handle. A friend coming along, and observing the jug, quietly remarked: "That's an awful careless way to leave that liquor!" "Why?" said Tom. "Because somebody might come along with the eight of clubs and take it!"

A GENTLEMAN playing at piquet, was much teased by a looker-on who was short-sighted, and having a very long nose, greatly incommoded the player. To get rid of the annoyance, the player took out his handkerchief, and applied it to the nose of his officious neighbor. "Ah! sir," said he, "I beg your pardon, but I really took it for my own."

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS.

THERE is nothing remarkable to record this week. The note of preparation for another struggle appears to be sounding along the sea-board. Sherman has his mind firmly fixed Charlestonwards, and Grant, in spite of the mud, has no thought of going into winter quarters. The army of Lee before Petersburg is reported in the despatches as being reinforced by Breckinridge's troops and a portion of the forces which retreated from Savannah, which is not likely, since Charleston demands more immediate attention.

January 1.—Richmond papers state that the Union troops shelled out the rebel lines between Dunlap's and Petersburg, on the 28th.

A report from North Carolina, through a rebel source, gives information that the Home Guard of that State, sent to meet the Union raiders at Bulfield, refused to cross the State line.

Gen. Kilpatrick returned safely to Savannah, after a successful raid to Altamaha bridge, on the Albany and Gulf railroad. He destroyed a great portion of the road. Ten locomotives and a large number of cars are shut up between Albany and the Altamaha river.

Gov. Vance of North Carolina is exceedingly nervous about the defence of his State, and calls upon everybody that "can fire a gun behind breastworks with a blanket," to go to Wilmington.

January 2.—From the Army of the Potomac, a despatch states that an attack was made by the rebels on our picket line, between Forts Howard and Wadsworth. Three hundred rebels charged without warning and drove our troops within their entrenchments, killing two, wounding three and capturing thirty. They then appropriated all the knapsacks and blankets they could find on the picket posts, and skedaddled.

Nearly all the steam-transports of the expeditionary fleet under command of Gen. Butler, which sailed from Fortress Monroe returned to that port in safety.

The latest news from Mobile reports Gen. Granger at Franklin Creek, Miss., three miles from Mobile, having met little opposition. The rebels are blockading with all their might the water front of the city. A force from Pensacola, under Gen. McKean, is said to be moving on Blakely, Baldwin county, 24 miles from Mobile. It is strongly argued that Granger's operations involve the speedy fall of that city.

Recruiting is very brisk and successful. "Returns received at the Provost-Marshal General's Bureau show that the number of men raised by recruiting is larger than at any period during the year."

The siege of Richmond progresses, according to the Herald correspondent. "Fifty picked men are now in command of Farrow's Island, in the James, near Dutch Gap. The rebels have been driven by this party from an important point opposite the Hawlett House Battery. Among the results accomplished by the movement is the destruction of the pontoon boats used by the rebels. Activity continues within the rebel lines. The troops which evacuated Savannah are doubtless on their way to reinforce Lee, as are also those of Breckinridge; so we may look for a hostile movement by Lee soon."

Early has withdrawn the greater portion of his forces far up the Shenandoah Valley. He has fallen back with his infantry to Waynesboro. His cavalry are operating on both sides of the Blue Ridge.

Late rebel papers contain accounts of a movement of North Carolina and Texas Unionists for the purpose of restoring their States to their proper position in the Union.

A force of about ten thousand, including the Second Maine Cavalry, First Florida Cavalry, and Fourteenth New York Cavalry, with three regiments colored infantry and two pieces artillery, under command of Colonel Robinson of the colored infantry, left for a raid into Alabama on the 13th, to sever the communication by telegraph and railroad at Pollard, and destroy such property and stores as might be found there. The Government property, commissary stores, ordnance, etc., with the buildings were destroyed. Two thousand stands of arms were captured. The railroad was also destroyed by our troops before the expedition returned.

The Times' Washington special despatch says it has authority for stating that the cotton captured at Savannah will be taken and sold by Government.

A private letter from the Federal fleet says that refugees from Charleston and other ports of South Carolina state that all the inhabitants who could do so have removed into the country. Great distress prevails, and scarcely any flour and other necessities can be obtained at any prices. Sherman's success occasions general alarm.

January 4.—According to the World's Beaufort correspondent, great preparations are being made by Sherman to resume offensive operations. A portion of Dahlgren's fleet is engaged removing obstructions from the Savannah river. Foster's army is still at Broad River landing, covering the Charleston and Savannah railroad. Hardee's army is reported to have been brought to a stand, and would probably be obliged to surrender. A fleet of ironclads had reached the harbor of Charleston, and would co-operate with Sherman in an attack on that city.

Sherman issued orders regulating the duties and obligations of the citizens of Savannah. A public meeting of the inhabitants was held in which resolutions were adopted, accepting the "situation" and submitting to the National authority. They claim the privilege of United States citizens. Hundreds have taken the oath of allegiance.

The Peace Resolutions offered in the North Carolina Legislature, according to the Richmond Sentinel, were defeated in the Senate by 19 to 21, under a motion to take them from the table.

The fleet before Wilmington encountered a violent gale. It is represented to have been the most terrible that has occurred for years. The ships of the Union rode out the storm in safety.

Strong efforts are still being made to give Lee the Military Dictatorship of the Southern Confederacy.

Deserters from the rebel army have taken possession of the North Carolina mountains, and expelled the rebel citizens. They defy the rebel authorities.

LOCAL MATTERS OF THE WEEK.

New Year happening on Sunday, 'twas voted it should "take in" Monday; two days thus giving, to satiety, the spico (well-named) of life, variety: prayer and present, sermon and ball, outpourings of grace—free drinks for all; the poorest could hear of the "loaves and the fishes," while all were enriched by their neighbors' kind wishes; no plan ever heard of under the sun worked better than keeping two New Year's in one.

Petitions are in circulation asking the Board of Supervisors to appoint 38 policemen in addition to the present force, (62.) 8,000 signatures have been obtained.

Wm. Farrell was arrested on Monday, charged with counterfeiting; $7,500 in bogus coin and $500 in altered greenbacks were found in his possession. The police have been watching him for some time, and think it a clear case.

Six tons of fish are sold in this city daily.

Several hundred colored people of this city, assisted by delegations from other towns, celebrated the Emancipation anniversary by a procession, oration and poem.

The receipts of the Police Court, for December, were $3,316; for the year, $42,755 75, an excess of $15,000 over any previous year.

Proposals will be received by the Treasurer until April 6th, for the surrender of City and County Slip Bonds to the amount of $15,000.

W. E. Robertson, one of the agents in exposing the alleged Hayes piracy case, was attacked on Market street, Sunday night last. One man attempted to stab him, when Robertson gave the fellow a telling blow; a confederate fired two shots; Robertson returned the compliment, lodging a ball, he thinks, in the would-be assassin. Robertson was arrested on a charge of carrying a concealed weapon, but was released on his recognizance, with Col. James as surety.

On Saturday evening last, a man was shot in the leg, at a saloon on the corner of Clay and Montgomery streets, by the accidental discharge of a pistol which he carried in his pocket, inflicting a severe flesh wound.

Silas Gartwright was arrested for forcibly entering the cabin of a Government schooner at Cowell's wharf, and stealing a pistol.

Patrick McCabe was convicted of beating his sister in a most brutal manner. He forfeited his bail ($20,) and a bench warrant was issued for his re-arrest.

A boat containing three men—Herman Paulding, David Miller and F. Nelson—capsized near Goat Island, Saturday. The party were rescued by J. Kohler, who resides on the island.

The Stock and Exchange Board donated $300, to be divided equally between the Protestant and Catholic Orphan Asylums for the purpose of providing a substantial New Year's dinner.

Michael Callahan, a discharged soldier, fell overboard from the steamer Senator, Monday night, and was drowned. The body has been recovered.

Mrs. Blake, while suffering from delirium tremens, jumped from the Oregon street wharf. She was rescued by officer O'Daley, whose interference she resented with such vigor that his shirt was in shreds by the time he had her safely housed.

F. E. Hogg, E. A. Swain, John Hiddle, T. J. Grady, J. L. Black, R. R. Lyon and Joshua Higgins, arrested on board the steamer Salvador, off Panama, on charge of taking passage on that vessel for the purpose of seizing and converting her into a rebel pirate, were brought into port by the Saginaw, and taken to Alcatraz, where they are now confined.

A young son of Harris Wood was brought before Judge Sawyer, Wednesday, on a writ of habeas corpus, having been taken from the whaleship Vineyard, on board of which he had been "Shanghaied." He was restored to his parents.

The Treasurer of the California Branch of the U. S. Sanitary Commission remitted, January 3d, to New York, $12,000 in gold coin, making $67,000 in coin and $7,592 in currency forwarded since September 1, 1864.

Miss E. A. Shaw, a teacher in the Denman school, was knocked down and dangerously injured by a runaway horse, on Clay street, Wednesday.

S. C. Simmons, who was Comptroller of the Pnoble of San Francisco, under the Ayuntamiento, during the years 1849 and 1850, died recently.

The Board of Education has elected as teachers, Sextus Shearer, jr., Miss Nellie J. Baldwin, Annie M. Hueks, M. J. Norton, H. E. McBride, H. Minerva Gates, Helen L. Weaver, Hannah Cooke, J. D. Littlefield, Mary F. Smith, E. N. Campbell, Lydia Derby, Philena Sawyer and E. M. Shaw.

A fire, doubtless from an accidental cause, occurred in a brick building, No. 38 California street, Thursday. The first floor of the building was occupied as a wholesale paint and oil store by J. R. Kelly, whose loss is probably covered by insurance. C. L. Taylor & Co., sash and blind makers, had their business office in the second floor; most of their books, office furniture, etc., were destroyed. In attempting to smother the flames, one of Mr. Kelly's workmen narrowly escaped being burned to death; his clothes caught fire, and he was obliged to jump into a tank—"taking water" to good purpose.

INTERIOR ITEMS.

The Leidesdorff Grant, 35,000 acres situated in Sacramento county, has been confirmed and patented to the executors of the estate of the late Capt. Folsom.

A late decision of the Supreme Court affirms the validity of the law of last winter in aid of the Pacific Railroad, and that the State must pay the interest in gold coin, for twenty years, on $1,500,000 of the bonds issued.

A detachment of 122 men, under Capt. Berry, arrived at Sacramento, a few days since, from Salt Lake. Their term of service has nearly expired.

John Housala, a native of Finland, was carried through the Franklin tunnel at Michigan Bluff, Cal., Dec. 20th, by a rush of mud and water. His remains were found, Dec. 28th, five miles below the tunnel, shockingly mutilated.

A little son of John Dollarhide, of Yolo county, was kicked by a horse, recently, and so severely injured that his recovery is doubtful.

A "Sabbath Convention" was held at Sacramento, Jan. 4th. Delegates were present from various parts of California.

The Grass Valley Union says, a few days since, some miners prospecting in the neighborhood of Bald Mountain, between Orr's ranch and Auburn, struck a very rich "pocket" of quartz, from which they obtained upwards of $5,000 in a few hours.

The Napa and Vallejo railway is progressing finely. A contract has been let for grading and laying the ties on four miles of the road, and building a bridge over Napa river, for $28,000.

An orange tree, sixteen feet high, in Folsom, has on it a crop of about 400 oranges. It blooms and blossoms through the entire summer and fall.

Jessie Lester, a cyprian of Virginia, Nevada, was shot in the shoulder, by some unknown enemy, a few days since.

The Sacramento Union appeared on Monday in a new dress, and, as usual on New Year's day, with a vast amount of tabular and statistical information relative to the events of the past year. The Union is an honor to the State.

A lady living near Healdsburg underwent an operation recently worthy of note, namely, the removal of a large tumor and four gallons of liquid. She had been suffering for several years from a disease which resulted in abdominal dropsy.

William Stone was garoted in Sacramento a few days since. The scoundrels got but little for their pains. Garoting is becoming quite fashionable in the Capital City this winter—biennial sessions now, you know.

The Crescent Quartz Mining Company, in Indian Valley, Plumas county, has declared a dividend of $50 per share, the Gould and Curry Silver Mining Company $75 per foot, and the Belcher, Baldwin and Abernethie Mining Companies each $8 per share.

Spring Creek mill, Shasta county, Cal., cleaned up, lately, after a run of five days, with eight stamps, sixteen pounds of amalgam, worth $96 per pound—a little over $300 per day.

A CERTAIN Scotchman, who is not a member of any temperance society, being asked by a dealer to purchase some fine old Jamaica, drily answered: "To tell you the truth, Mr. —, I canna' say I'm very fond of rum; for if I take more than six tumblers, it's very apt to give me a headache."

WET AND DRY.—What a great propensity people have for inhibiting "something" in rainy weather! How can one account for the paradoxical fact that the wetter they get the drier they are? We dropped into Squarza's yesterday afternoon, and from the concourse we found practicing at his bar, concluded that Signor Squarza was a great benefactor in these wet times, and that the compounds of his laboratory were more sought after than India-rubber overcoats and umbrellas.

GLORIOUS NEWS.—Six pounds White Granulated Sugar, $1; nine pounds Cooking Sugar, $1; seven pounds Cooking Raisins, $1; six-pound boxes Raisins, $1; six pounds Currants, $1; eight pounds new Dried Apples, $1; seven pounds Prunes, $1; seven pounds California Dried Peaches, $1; four pounds Green Coffee, $1; nine pounds Rice, $1. ALLEN'S

LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

Medical men have attempted to explain what it is, but admit that they have not discovered its antidote. Dr. Goodale offers this simple definition of its character: It is a disorder which he DOES CURE and they DO NOT. This is the great fact which it imports the sufferer to know, and a single trial will establish it beyond a question. Price, $1. Sold by all Druggists.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE reduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or floor gold it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs. in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration, particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave discs, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and discs, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

ECONOMY.

I THINK women have had enough said to them on the score of economy. Half of them spend their best days now in trying to grind twenty-five cents into a dollar, or in making painful efforts to save twenty-five cents out of a dollar—and it contracts their minds, sharpens their features, and pinches in unnaturally soul and body.

Judgment and common sense should always regulate expenditure according to the means, but it is certainly better to learn how to increase one's income than constantly and narrowly to calculate how to always live within it. Nations become wealthy by the development of their resources, not by holding and refusing to complete them.

Not that I would counsel women who are wives and mothers to seek outside employment for the sake of adding to the general income. A woman at the head of a house has full as much upon her hands as she can attend to, but she should employ her daughters; she should bring them up to assist either in the work of the house, and thus save the hire and waste of servants, or else to earn the money they require for their own use in some other way. If fate kept them single, they would then be independent; if, on the contrary, they married, they would have had a training which would fit them for good wives and mothers in their turn.

What women want to have hammered into their foolish heads is not how to economize, but how to make money, and the seemingly obvious fact that there is no more disgrace in earning money than there is in spending it.

A penny saved is a penny earned, says the old proverb, but it is better to earn two pennies than to work as hard trying to save one.

The developments of science and mechanism make it easier to earn money now than formerly. And why, instead of still trying to live on as little, should we not enjoy the increased comforts and luxuries it brings? Sewing girls can earn six dollars on the machine, where they formerly earned three by hand, and are so much better off, or would be if we had no war, and greenbacks were as good as gold.

It is a money-making age. We have gold fields, oil fields, cotton fields, and wheat fields, not to speak of the gold to be found in a tub of golden butter; and why may not women expand their wings a little and see if for them the earth will not yield up some of its treasures? They have been cramped and restricted long enough; give them a chance to acquire means of their own, to get rid of their puny cares and enjoy life in profusion.

I don't believe the Creator ever intended us to be niggardly; it is not by the twenty-five cents' worth that he sends his rain or his sunshine; he does not stop to count the blades of grass, or the leaves on the trees, or the icicles and snow-flakes which make up a grand winter panorama; and I don't believe that he sent us into this beautiful world to wear ourselves thin and ugly by pinching, and contriving, and planning, and saving. Else why has he scattered wealth on every hand so profusely? and why made it the instinct in all ages to reward good deeds with wealth and honors, and bad ones with final poverty and disgrace.

It is a good thing to know how to use economy when it is needful; but it is better to have the will and power to give out of one's abundance to others. The habit of economy does not tend to make people liberal; it tends to selfishness, and those who have practiced it from necessity in their earlier years, find that it grows upon them until it becomes the most despicable meanness later in life, and when the first necessity no longer exists.—"Jennie June," in the New York Leader.

AN EDITOR AT PEACE.—An exchange paper in a complimentary notice of an editor gone "to that bourne" etc., thus sums up the blessings which follow his rest:

"Are we not glad, also, that such an editor is in heaven? There the cry of 'more copy' shall never be abused any more by his political antagonists, with lies and detractions that should shame a demagogue to promulgate. There he shall no more be used as a ladder for the aspiring to kick down as they reach the desired height and need him no more. There he shall be able to see the immense masses of mind he has moved, all unknowingly and unknown as he has been during his weary pilgrimage on earth. There he will find all articles credited, not a clasp of his thunder stolen—and there shall be no horrid typographical errors to set him in a fever. We are glad the editor is in heaven."

MISCELLANEOUS.

CHOICE OF PAPERS FOR ROOMS.—Many elegant patterns are displayed on colored grounds; the effect may please in one room which in another will be displeasing, yet the cause will be inexplicable; light, more or less, will account for the difference. Colored grounds, however pale, will always be too gloomy in rooms which have not much light. In a compact city this is an essential matter of consideration; even in the country the aspect and number of windows will produce a surprising difference in the general effect. Nor ought any erroneous idea to be entertained that a paper with much white in it will quickly soil, and therefore must be more extravagant; for if white soils, colors fade. A room, then, scantily supplied with windows, ought never to be papered with a colored ground; for the same reason, the doors and other wood-work should invariably be white. Apartments well supplied with light may rejoice in a less confined range of colors. Another failure in effect—little suspected in the choice of colors, even where light can be commanded to an unlimited extent—is the want of consideration of the hue that will best "light up." Exquisite as is pale blue in itself, it is heavy in a mass; and even where sparingly introduced, as, even in small portions, among gilding and pure white, (as in large concert rooms,) it dulls the whole. A blue dress by candle-light is unsatisfactory; and a room with blue-grounded paper and blue paint to correspond, will never light well at night; an apartment similarly decorated with buff or "flesh" color which would require but six wax candles to produce a cheerful and sufficient illumination, would, if blue, swallow up the light of several gas jets, and then not produce an agreeable impression. Pale flesh, or pink and buff, are very charming hues, but are ill for the complexion; few persons look in health with much of these colors around them; and blue is trying; white with a hint of blush, or tint of stone, is good. The most perfect—or rather the nearest approach to perfection—is a paper with a pure white ground, and running pattern of shaded slates, and white paint, "picked in" with pale slate to correspond. Rooms hung with or painted scarlet are rich, but very dismal, and invariably look less than if adorned with a light tint. They require, also, to be illuminated more, and much earlier in the evening than those with pale colors. Towards dusk scarlet appears black; let any person doubting this try the fact, by wearing a scarlet cloak or shawl, and look at it as the shades of twilight advance. Yellow, and buff, and pink, can be scarcely better discriminated by candle-light than can blue and green.

DUMAS COMINO.—Alexander Dumas, it is said, intends soon to make a visit to the United States, and will probably write his "experiences" in a book. Our people may relish a little fresh gossip regarding the novelist's habits, personal appearance, etc.; we, therefore, make room for the following paragraph from a recent Paris letter to the Boston Transcript: "Dumas is an astonishing worker. He writes twelve hours a day—never sees his manuscript till it comes to him from the printer. He writes a plain, round, readable hand—rarely makes an erasure or an interlineation. His copyrights are worth to him from forty to sixty thousand dollars a year, yet he is always in debt, and borrowing with one hand from all that will lend, while, with the other, he bestows liberally on poor artists and Bohemians generally. He never pays any debts, and keeps no accounts. He has been arrested several times. His creditors at one time had his copyrights for nearly a year, until he was obliged to pay for them. During this time, of course, he lived by borrowing. He pays his cook, however. It is doubtful if he would do even this if he could help it; but in this case the claims of his stomach are equal to the motions of conscience in ordinary men. He lives at Bagheim, about eight miles from Paris, where he gives charming breakfast parties to his literary friends. He is excessively vain, aud, of course, fond of display. He has nearly completed a novel, St. Félicé, which is being published as a feuilleton, in the Journal La Presse, for which he is paid at the enormous rate of one centime—the tenth part of a sou or cent—a letter, which amounts to eight or ten cents a line.

THE NUNNERY CENSOR.—I had been denounced before another Abbess as a reader of mundane literature, or that irrelevant to ecclesiastical subjects. A spy having informed her, I was caught en flagrant délit, by the Superior, with the book in my hand. "What good book is this you are reading, my daughter? Let me look at it!" said she. There being no time to conceal it, I was obliged to hand it to her, not without a lively disquietude concerning my justification of such a possession. The Abbess put on her spectacles, and having read the title of it, restored me the closed book, saying—"The Memoirs of St. Helena. Ah! the Life of St. Constantine's mother! How they are perpetually calumniating this poor, poor girl!" It was a "Memorial of St. Helena," and a little later I satisfied myself that the eminent Superior of San Gregorio was entirely innocent of the name and fame of Napoleon the Great!—Memoirs of an ex-Benedictine Nun.

RICHARD HILDRETH.—We observe with the greatest regret a statement that Richard Hildreth, the historian, who was appointed in 1861 Consul to Trieste, is hopelessly ill with a softening of the brain.

Mr. Hildreth is one of the quiet, patient, persistent, and efficient workmen, who do less for their own fame than that of others. He belongs to that great body of unrecognized students and authors who supply the hard-earned material upon which others build, like the coral insects, who invisibly construct the reefs upon which islands rise, in whose foliage the most brilliant birds soar and sing.

His history of the United States, from the settlement of the country down to 1821, fills six volumes, and is a monument of faithful labor and extensive research. It traces with clearness the steadily-progressive development of the great controversy which has now ended in civil war, and is a body of political information quite unsurpassed. It is none the less valuable that Mr. Hildreth is a Federalist of the Hamiltonian school, for recent events show beyond question that Hamilton was not altogether wrong in his estimate of the tendency of our system. The work has few graces of style; but it is clear and concise and honest, and is indispensable to the student of American history.

Other works of Mr. Hildreth reveal the same qualities of accuracy and thoroughness, and his long fidelity to the principles which brought the Administration into power four years ago was properly recognized by his consular appointment. We had hoped that his labors might be suspended and his health established in the soft Adriatic air. But if the news be true, Mr. Hildreth is another of the learned and exhausted scholars by whose melancholy fate all hard workers with the brain should be warned.—Harpers' Weekly.

A PHOTOGRAPHIC BABY.—The following appears in the last number of the British Journal of October 30th: "Some time since my wife was engaged preparing albumen paper in the silver bath, and in a moment of abstraction pressed two of her fingers on her forehead, being at about that time to add another olive branch to the family. Soon after the birth of the baby we were surprised and annoyed at noticing that the child when in a strong light, exhibited two distinct impressions similar to the silver stains before fixing; and the strangest part of the matter is that these disappear as night comes on and reappear as daylight arrives. I have not yet attempted to tone and fix these said stains; and, although at present serving as a sort of antiometer to me, will prove a sad disfigurement to my daughter's appearance in daylight, and we much regret they were not impressed in some less conspicuous place. I am, etc., the Father of the Photographic Baby." The editor adds: "Were the writer of the foregoing not known to us, we should have thrown aside his letter as an impudent hoax; but as we know him well as an excellent photographer, a good citizen, and as being little addicted to joking, we give his communication a place in our journal and leave those more competent than ourselves to explain the strange phenomenon, which we believe to be faithfully recorded by our correspondent."

WHAT TO DO IF THE CLOTHES TAKE FIRE.—Perhaps three persons out of four would rush right up to the burning individual, and begin to paw with their hands without any definite aim. It is useless to tell the victim to do this or that, or call for water. In fact it is generally best to say not a word, but seize a blanket from a bed, or a cloak, or any woollen fabric—if none is at hand, take any woollen material—hold the corners as far apart as you can, stretch them out higher than your head, and, running boldly to the person, make a motion of clapping in the arms, most about the shoulders. This instantly smothers the fire and saves the face. The next instant throw the unfortunate person on the floor. This is an additional safety to the face and breath, and any remnant of flame can be put out more leisurely. The next moment immerse the burnt part in sweet oil. Next get some common flour, and put it on the burn, about an inch in thickness, and if possible, put the patient to bed. Let the flour remain until it falls off itself, when a beautiful new skin will be found. Unless the burns are deep, no other application is needed. The dry flour for burns is the most admirable remedy ever proposed, and the information ought to be imparted to all. Dredge on the flour until no more will stick, and cover with cotton batting.

GOT.—The word got is often used superfluously and incorrectly in familiar expressions. When, in reply to my "Lend me a shilling," you say, "I've got no money," you simply say what you do not mean. Omit the got, and your meaning is rightly conveyed. "I've got a cold" is not bad English, if you mean to convey the idea that you have procured or contracted a cold somewhere; but if you merely wish to say, as you probably do, that you are suffering under a cold, "I have a cold" is the proper expression. "She has got a fair complexion." Here got is an interloper, for you do not mean to say she has procured a fair complexion, but simply that she has one. "I've got to go to town to-morrow." Here got is redundant and incorrect. "I have to go" expresses the idea.

ON AND AFTER APRIL 1, 1864, Trains will start from the City and the Mission as follows:

FROM THE MISSION.
9:40	10:20	11:00	11:40
FROM THE CITY
10:00	10:40	11:20	12:00

And so on till 6 o'clock.
Before 9 A. M. and after 6 P. M., the running will be the same as before.

F. MCCOPPIN, Superintendent.

THE BACHELOR'S DREAM EXPLAINED.

I think you remember that some months ago,
I was courting a handsome young girl;
Since then I went travelling up country, you know,
And I've now lost the run of my Belle.

I loved her so dearly—I do love her yet,
Of course she must know very well;
Indeed, I am ready to go in a fit
Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

I've made an inquiry of all the young chaps—
Been searching at every hotel;
I've now and then called on old Schiedam Schnapps
Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

Kept running all day like a fool in the street,
To search for another young girl;
And every fine lady I chance for to meet,
I've inquired for my old lover, Belle.

I start for a Photographic Gallery,
To look for my sweet little Belle;
And who in the name you think I should see?
A face of that very same girl!

I then said, "Dear Belle, I've caught you at last;
Are you lying, or here in disguise?"
And what do you think, my friends, it was?
A picture of her in life size.

Now to be seen at H. BUSH'S Gallery, corner of Post,
Market and Montgomery streets, entrance opposite the Masonic Hall.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

THE SAFE PATH TO HEALTH!

PURIFY THE BLOOD!

The value of Brandreth's Pills, in a climate like ours is hardly to be estimated. Their prompt use every day saves valuable lives. Always keep them in the house.

In cholera and in sudden pains of all kinds they soon give relief, and the patient is restored with renewed health.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

For one hundred and thirteen years, have held their reputation for efficacy, mildness, and absolute certainty of operation; in fact, they are admitted to be the BEST PUR-GATIVE by all who have used them.

THEY ARE UNRIVALLED AS A FAMILY

MEDICINE,

In Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Habitual Constiveness,
Rheumatic Pains in the Head, in Affections of the Kidneys, in the Diseases of Children, and for Worms, and as a General Purifier of the Blood. For Colds, Bilious Affections, Fever and Disorders arising from Obstructed Perspiration, so common in this climate, they have not their equals among all the Medicines of the Day.

AS A PURGATIVE AND BILIOUS PILL,

They have not their equal in the world. Employed according to directions, accompanying every box of new style, they produce

Great Purity of the Blood and System Generally.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box,

B. A. HENRICKSEN'S

PATENT CHIMNEY TOP.

THIS useful invention is confidently recommended in all cases where it is desirable to create a great draft.

ON STEAMSHIPS

Its use will dispense with the use of the blower and the tall smoke stack, as it causes the furnace to consume the smoke. It has been successfully used on steamers, in San Francisco. The proprietor has permission to refer to Chas. McIntire, Esq., as to its value on steamers.

FOUNDRIES AND MACHINE SHOPS,

And all works requiring a great heat will find it of immense benefit. Stephen Culverwell and Lyon & Co., Browsers, are now using it, and to them I refer.

ON SAILING VESSELS

It has been used to great advantage, where, on account of baffling winds, it is difficult to keep fire in the galley.

FOR SMOKY CHIMNEYS

It is a sure cure, and has been used on the Russ House and other first-class buildings in this city.

FOR VENTILLATION,

It is unexcelled, and is recommended to architects and owners of buildings where ventilation is required.

FOR MINING PURPOSES

It is well adapted, thoroughly removing all foul air from shafts and tunnels.

The proprietor also refers to the following gentlemen, who have used it: Capt. Lassen, brig Crimea; Dr. Nuttall, Calhoun & Son, Printers; Elderly & Wickman, Ship Chauders; J. B. Quintin, builder; Philip Caduc, Esq.

OUR NEW YORK LETTER.

[FROM THE CALIFORNIAN'S LADY CORRESPONDENT.]

NEW YORK, December 13th, 1864.

A FAT man in London, named Banting, has reduced his size by a system of diet—to that of a Bantam probably—and given the result of his system in a pamphlet, which has sold to the amount of 70,000 copies there. It has been seized upon with that despairing avidity which characterizes the fat. Two fat men have experimented upon their adiposity in this city. One of them is an old "public functionary," Mr. Cook, the leader of the orchestra in Burton's theatre, some years ago, and now a desultory musician. He was so big that his body appeared like a sack of meal, with no innate power of movement; he could only half turn his head towards his players to indicate an andante or allegro strain. He has eaten down his eighty pounds of ponderosity in a few weeks, and now only weighs about two hundred and fifty pounds. The other instance is that of a military man, who was all girth and glory. He now exhibits as a trophy his loose waistcoat, which he wears with its original dimensions, to show how thin he has become. He complains of a loose skin, but no doubt its remedy is in Banting. There are some disagreeable features in the system; no whisky is allowed, but brandy is. Who can afford to drink brandy in America? Champagne is allowed, but who can drink it here, except when the hour after midnight arrives, when the pulse of every man who is awake beats to the tune of "Go it while you're young," and "green seal" is ordered with a mind oblivious to the coming bill? Milk is prohibited, all malt liquors, all sugary and mucilaginous articles; in short, Banting, like all theorists, don't allow much of anything that one generally wants.

I am looking hopefully forward for the genius to rise up and clothe the skeletons—who live with bones, nerves, but who have no flesh. Reasoning from Banting, I might expect complete indulgence from his rival benefactor, but I know too well what the principle of change and improvement is. The thin will be compelled to practice as much self-denial as the thick.

Would you like to have a Fashion article? Thinking one might be desired. I looked over magazines, and read up the subject. The sum total of my reading is that "passementerie asserts itself in new and pretty forms continually. Zealous in your behalf, I even went to my dressmaker's, who employs fifteen girls to help her break her promises about sending things home. All the satisfaction I obtained from her was the information "that prices was awful; that ladies would distract her with wanting things 'matched,' that she had to go all over New York to get the 'right shades,' and that sleeves were all made the same." Commend me to the rooms of the mantuamaker and the milliner for the display of the weakest traits of my sex. The long discussion I listened to the other day between two young ladies in deep mourning and an ancient milliner, who through the whole of it kept a bonnet perched on her fist, which she turned round and round, has given me a deep longing for Zimmerman. Let me escape from the women who argue on flowers, feathers and "bugles;" let me fly from her who looks between two glasses to get the effect of the crown and side trimmings, and who says with "nods and becks and wreathed smiles," "If I were Mrs. Crowningshaft, I could not be seen in such a hat as she wore to church last Sunday." May I depart forever from the obsequious, weary milliner who repeats, "Ladies' tastes differs," and "that shade of velvet is worn very much; it is a nelegent blue."

I renounce fashion articles.

To show, however, that I am not exempt from the enjoyment which pertains to dress, I will mention the excellence of that custom now honored in the observance of skirmishing among "remnants" at the larger shops instead of charging at the display of whole pieces on the various counters. There are "remnants" of everything for sale at present, from a yard and seven eighths of York mills, to thirteen yards of the most expensive silk strapped on a board, as if its own cost had driven it mad. I bought a remnant of silk at Stewart's for twenty-two dollars, and by an effort of skill tortured it into a dress, which is a monument of human ingenuity, and passes off in society as a whole regular pattern. I also purchased a remnant of cassimere, if that is the masculine way of spelling it, of the finest quality, for three dollars and fifty cents, and constructed a basque out of it, and though I came to grief when I arrived at the sleeves, for there was not enough for sleeves, my friends consider it a triumph, provided I keep my arms close to my sides and do not betray where it is pieced.

Shall I now approach the weather? Can I, as a newspaper correspondent, do as much justice to the subject as the one who writes of the present season thus: "Yesterday chilling puffs of wind and gray skies, threatened a too abundant supply of that peculiar abomination of New York called slush?"

It is very cold this morning. Last night I put two paper knives and newspaper wads in the window sash to keep out the wind, but the wind would come in. The curtains are in a tremor this morning and my apartment is so cold this moment that I am obliged to leave my writing now and then to go and warm my hands over the fire. Several people have been in, who took seats all of a dither, and informed me that the "wind was piercing;" that "it is the coldest day we have had;" and that "winter has set in in good earnest." They have said also, "Haden't you better go out and try it?" "Guess you sit too much and write, don't you?"

Frozen pigs ride about now by the hundreds: horses slip by their fore feet and their hind feet, in every street; and the animal called the "ashman," is careless with his garbage, and leaves celery tops, potato skins and cinders before our front doors. It is, in fact, winter weather. As Shakspeare hath it:

"When icicles hang by the wall,
And Dick the shepherd blows his nail,
And Tom hears logs into the hall
And milk comes frozen home in pail,
When blood is nipped, and ways be foul,
Then nightly sings the staring owl
To-whoo;

To-whit, to-whoo, a merry note,
While greasy Joan doth keel the pot."

Each season makes the country poetical for the poet's use, but who can turn the city into verse? When Cowper said that God made the country and man made the town, he did a better thing than when he wrote that dreadful hymn, "There is a fountain filled with blood." Hood must have agreed with Cowper's bon mot; his poem, "The Bridge of Sighs," is a protest against what man has made the city. What a Suspira de Profundis those verses are! If God's throne is not reached by such means, will the prayers of the Church of England ever avail?

Since we hear that General Grant has "Lee by the throat," the substitutes are running away from him, in the belief, probably, that there is no need of their services. They have taken the money paid them by those whose opinion is that discretion is the better part of valor, and acted upon the same principle. Some of the regiments of the Army of the Potomac have no more than thirty men. Brave substitutes, you teach us that when we have a draft again, we must go ourselves. Alas, and alas!

Has the President's Message been telegraphed to you? You will perceive, if it has, that he did not quote from his own speech made in reference to President Polk's Message, which had no intimation of the end of the Mexican war, whereat Mr. Lincoln waxed wrathful. May we be allowed to mention that in President Lincoln's late Message there is nothing said of the end of the present war?

E. D. B. S.

A D I E U.

A D I E U! adieu!

Oh, fond and true
And faithful hearted!
Doth not our friendship seem
As leaves that on a stream
Together started?
Awhile, 'neath cloud or sun,
We floated on as one,
And then—were parted.

O Land of Hearts!

No friend departs
From thy still bowers;
Days fall from time away
As fragrant leaves decay
From summer flowers;
And years of perfect bliss,
Precious as Love's first kiss,
Seem hut as hours.

O Reaper dumb!

When thou shalt come
In life's fall-weather,
To reap the ripened grain,
To mow the grassy plain
And strip the heather;
I pray, amid your sheaves
Bind these two parted leaves
For aye together.

EMILIE LAWSON.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 14th, 1865.

ADVICE is not so commonly thrown away as is imagined. We seek it in difficulties. But, in common speech, we are apt to confound it with admonition; as when a friend reminds one that drink is prejudicial to the health, etc. We do not care to be told of that which we know better than the good man that admonishes. M. sent to his friend L., who is no water drinker, a twopenny tract against the use of fermented liquors. L. acknowledged the obligation, as far as to two pence. Penotier's advice was the safest, after all:

"I advised him"—

But I must tell you. The dear good-meaning, no-thinking creature had been dumfounding a company of us with a detail of inextricable difficulties, in which the circumstances of an acquaintance of his were involved. No clue of light offered itself. He grew more and more misty as he proceeded. We pitied his friend, and thought—

"God help the man so rapt in Error's endless maze!"

when, suddenly brightening up his placid countenance, like one that had found out a riddle, and looked to have the solution admired:

"At last," said he, "I advised him"—

Here he paused, and here we were again interminably thrown back. By no possible guess could any of us aim at the drift of the meaning he was about to be delivered of.

"I advised him," he repeated, "to have some advice upon the subject."

A general approbation followed; and it was unanimously agreed that, under all the circumstances of the case, no sounder or more judicious counsel could have been given.—Charles Lamb.

UNDER THE LINDENS.

UNDER the lindens lately sat,
A couple, and no more, in chat;
I pondered what they would be at
Under the lindens.

I saw four eyes and four lips meet,
I heard the words—How sweet! how sweet!
Had then the Fairies given a treat
Under the lindens?

I pondered long and could not tell
What dainty pleased them both so well;
Bees! bees! was it your hydromel
Under the lindens?
(Walter Savage Landor.)

GOSSIP FROM PARIS.

THE CAFE DE FOY.

* * * I fell into these reflections the last night I spent at the Café de Foy. It was the Café de Foy's last night. Next day the auctioneer sang its requiem, which the Carthusian monks may use instead of "Brother, thou shalt surely die!" Would not "Going! going! gone!" uttered solemnly, in a deep bass, be a stern reminder of the swiftness with which our shadow is fading on the wall? I liked that old Café with its quaint walls and quiet ways. There was not a bit of gilding in the whole room. The decoration was a red ground with carved wood painted white. It wore a sedate, aristocratic, old family look which pleased me. The effect of this look was increased by the gentle light which a discreet number of lamps threw over the saloon. There was none of that impertinent attempt to rival the sun which every café on the boulevards makes from six o'clock till midnight. It is true the lamps were gas burners whose introduction was said to have been a great mistake of the proprietor. Thirty customers quitted him the evening the oil lamps were disused. They were his best customers, children of old customers whose tribute to the till of the café was something hereditary. They preferred the quiet light of the lamps to the light of the gas which, modest as it was, seemed garish by the older-fashioned light. These gentlemen lost something of themselves—some portion of their past life—when the oil lamps disappeared.

Other customers dropped off when beer was admitted among the refreshments of the café. You may smile on, until you learn the reason. Beer brings after it an inferior class of people, who lowered the tone of the café. It was no longer the chapel-of-ease to drawing-rooms. It became a portico to the public squares. I believe it was not until the northern invasion in 1855, when over the Rhene and the Danube poured forth tribes of the curious to visit the World's Fair held that year, that the master of the café consented to serve beer. The diapason of the café was soon lowered, for Tom, Dick and Harry went there to slack their thirst. The establishment of so many clubs likewise dealt a sensible blow to the café. In older times the Café de Foy was a sort of club, but as the democratic tide rose and filled cafés and restaurants, clubs for the sake of ease deserted the cafés and founded the modern institution which bears their name and whose portal no one may cross until after a formal election. Nevertheless there must be in an immense Capital a great many people of gentle birth and decayed fortunes who would be unable to bear the expense of a club. Those would take refuge in a café snited with their tastes. But the manager of the Café de Foy somehow managed to lose those customers too; and as his establishment was not brilliant enough for other tastes, nothing remained for him but to close his doors. I regret it. In its later days even, it was to my taste the most agreeable café in Paris. The coffee was better there than anywhere else; the brandy was excellent. So much for its post-prandial demi-tasse. I have occasionally breakfasted there, and found its coffee-with-milk, its bread and butter unsurpassed here, and its meat as good as you get anywhere. To be sure the service was not so stylish as at the Café Anglais or at Vachette's, but then the "Total" of the bill didn't wear crinoline, (it does at the other two places,) and my present purse is too small to allow anything of such volume to effect entrance. His orgate was almost as thick as you can get it at Swann's English apothecary shop and almost as good as the latter's.

It was, too, invested with historical interest. It was founded in 1749 by a retired military man, Mons. de Foy, in the block of houses on the Rue de Richelieu, which looked on the garden of the Palais Royal. About 1774 Mons. de Foy sold it to a man named Jousseureau, who had just married a beautiful woman. The Duke of Orleans (Egalité) heard of her extraordinary beauty and determined to see her. He entered the café one evening and took an ice. Her beauty made such an impression on him that he repeated his visit. Madame Jousseureau sought private audience of the Duke and proved herself so agreeable as to win from His Royal Highness license authorising her husband to sell refreshments and ices in the great horse-chestnut avenue of the Palais Royal, on whose site the Galerie Montpensier is built. When this gallery or arcade was built in 1792, Madame Jousseureau obtained the rooms where the Café de Foy stood until the auctioner destroyed it. It was the first café opened in the Palais Royal. It was upon one of its tables that Camille Desmoulins stood the eve of the taking of the Bastille and harangued the people; after his speech he broke a green twig from a tree in the garden of the Palais Royal, called the people to arms and led them to the Bastille—so the death-warrant of that celebrated citadel may be said to have been signed and sealed in that café! That café was the favorite rendezvous of Joseph Vernet, the famous painter of sea pieces, and of Carle Vernet ("son of a king and father of a king—never a king," as he often described himself, alluding to his father, Joseph, and his son, Horace,) and of Horace Vernet. Here Carle's inveterate punning made the whole saloon ring with laughter. Cambaceres lived during the Empire in the Palais Royal. You remember what a glutton he was. After dinner he walked around the arcades of the Palais Royal to facilitate his digestion. As he passed in front of the Café de Foy a waiter would bring out a glass of iced water which he would toss off and continue his walk. This glass—Cambaceres's glass as it was called—was long kept at the Café de Foy. One day Alfred de Musset took it into his head to drink absinth in it, and he accidentally broke it. Among the later frequenters of the Café de Foy was an old publisher named Vente, who died as late as 1852. He was the publisher of Retif de la Bretonne. When Gerard de Nerval began collecting materials for his sketch of that novelist he applied to Mons. Vente for some information which was insolently refused to the astonished Gerard de Nerval. He soon afterwards read a passage in Retif's Memoirs which explained Mons. Vente's anger. The passage ran: "I could not go to that performance, for I had on this same evening a rendezvous with the wife of the publisher Etnev," which last word is Vente spelt backwards. It was in the Café de Foy that poor Gerard de Nerval went crazy. One night, while sitting at a table reading the Revue des Deux Mondes, he took off his bottines, threw them at the ceiling and ran out of the café screaming.

ABOUT ACTORS.

* * * Ask me to tell you in one word the characteristic of the actor's life, I should say—Tears. I do not mean of those actors whose nerves, well packed in fat, are like a rich man's drawing-room secured by double windows and list and curtains from every wind that blows. They "sleep o' nights" and never feel gusty passion's agitations. But I mean an actor who aspires to win applause, who feels an audience's coldness as Lymph feel its hisses, whose breast is fired by the fever which attends ambition. Take, for instance, the novice which precedes professional life, whose agony is never so much as suspected by the public. All professions where talents cannot immediately be measured are preceded by this painful novitiate. The shopman earns his bread and meat and clothes and lodging from the day he enlists. If he can read and write and cypher he has all the talents required, and these talents he can exert from the outset. The young lawyer himself may, though less easily, win victuals and clothes by the clerical and collecting duties which are the meanest offices of his profession. But the actor must be able to take a prominent part from the first, he must have a well-stored memory (which is a work of time,) he must have command of voice or he can earn nothing. I say nothing, for what are the earnings of a supernumerary, whose duties are fulfilled by a workman whose day of labor is ended? Take an actor on the English or French stage and bid him tell the story of his novitiate. What a fearful narrative of starved days and half-frozen nights, insolent creditors and mortifying shifts! Each bramble and briar on the roadside (and Heaven knows they abound on the dreary way!) tears away and keeps some bleeding fragment of the heart! You know Rachel's career. I told you Beauvallet's and Mellingue's and Tisserand's. But you may say this is ancient or mediæval history: the world was gentler now, life has grown less cruel. You are mistaken. I'll tell you the story of two actresses here, whose united ages are not thirty-six years, neither of whom, were either your sister, you would consider old enough to leave her mother's side, though he who invited her forth offered a husband's arm for her protection. One of them had a horrid wretch for a mother, who was so unsexed as to sell her daughter (the now applauded Parisian actress,) to a heartless libertine of the provincial town in which they lived. Although the child was only fourteen years old, she was sensible of the ruin which awaited her if her mother's ignoble bargain were executed. She fled from it. Her mother overtook her and in her fury plunged a dagger in her breast. The unnatural mother was tried and sent to the penitentiary for several years. The child of fourteen took in her arms her little sister then four years old and quitted their native town by the first road before them. Where she went she knew not. She slept in the woods or beneath a stack of hay or straw and lived on roots and green leaves. At last, wearied and famishing, she knocked at a door and prayed for charity. As fortune—wasn't it Heaven?—would have it, this house happened to be tenanted by good souls—husband and wife—strolling players. They knew (what a book of lamentations the true story of a strolling player's wife would make!) how bitter were the ingredients of poverty's chalice and they took pity upon the little female waifs. The eldest strove her best to earn the bread given her, and her sister by aiding every way in the household management. At her leisure hours she would devour the printed plays scattered about the house. At night she would, after patting her sister to sleep, accompany her benefactors to the theatre and follow the play all attention. One day her mistress fell sick. The husband, manager and all the actors were in great distress, for her illness would force them to postpone the play, and a postponed play is a day lost—a serious loss to these children of poverty. The little girl said to her mistress: "I will take your place, madame, if you desire it;" and to show that she would do so, she declaimed the best passages of the part and sang the most brilliant couplets. The manager gave her an engagement at once of 60*f.* a month. She worked hard and slowly made her way up the profession until she obtained an engagement at Paris, where she now earns 15,000*f.* a year. Her little sister, saddened by these early trials, has taken refuge in a convent.

Shall I tell you now the story of the Swedish songstress whose maiden appearance at the Theatre Lyrique is expected with so much interest? Her warmest admirers cast for her a horoscope as brilliant as Jenny Lind's. I am a little sceptical in accepting this nativity for the truth. We have had so many Swedish girls who were to run Jenny Lind's career and whom we found nothing like Jenny Lind except in baptismal certificate, blonde hair and blue eyes, while we were taught to expect from them Jenny Lind's voice and soul. Mile. Nilsson (such is the name of the new candidate for lyric honors) was born in the midst of extreme poverty. When she was six years old her parents—who had taught her to play the violin—placed this instrument in her hand and bade her go from café to wine shop and make sure to bring home a plentiful supply of sous or—woe! So Rachel learned to face the Hydra whose unfamiliar faces have Gorgon's power! The family went with her from village to village, always afoot whether it rained or snowed, often n-hungered, oftener drenched to the skin. Northern are inhospitable skies. One day a gentleman was struck by the deep and exquisite musical sentiment of the little itinerant. His heart was touched by her youth, (she ought to have been gamboling, not laboring) her sex (too precious a jewel to be borne unadorned in tavern halls mid drunken revels) and her rags. He offered to take charge of her musical education. His proposal was accepted. He sent her to Copenhagen. Her astonishing progress confirmed his anticipations. Her professors there engaged her to come to Paris and place herself under the best masters here. She has been here some time under the direction of Mons. Wartel the well-known singing-master, who predicted for her as brilliant a career as anybody has prophesied.

* * * The public cannot divest themselves of the illusion that an actor differs—some how or another—from other men. The public believes, too, that those "idle fellows" are singularly profligate. This is a wrong impression even in this city where certainly there is immorality enough and where the genius of the French people rather encourages immorality. There are classes of actresses here who are extremely licentious; but these women cannot be called actresses. They resort to the stage because it is the best advertisement of their beauty and charms. They do not live by the stage. They know their dramatic career cannot extend beyond their youth. Earnest actors and actresses lead as quiet lives here as if they were retired tradesmen of Newton. Mons. and Mme. Gueymard leave the opera every night in their carriage for Neuilly where they live, and when there is no performance they stick to their chimney as close as any couple you ever saw. Caroline Duprez lives with her father and brethren in an old-fashioned, patriarchal way. Mons. Regnier drives at once from the French Comedy to his beautiful villa at Neuilly and is only too glad to reach his pillow. He, too, sticks at home when the theatre does not summon him to Paris. The brilliant Mons. Delaunay leaves his comfortable, happy home and charming wife and children as rarely as his engagements permit. Mons. Mellingue lives at Belleville, surrounded by his numerous family, and, if he has no engagement at the Porte St. Martin Theatre, does not come to town once in six months. Mons. Geoffroy is accused of being fond of his studio (for he is an excellent painter as well as actor)—so I might go through the Dramatic Directory and show you how domestic all our good actors are. But could I destroy the illusions which possess audiences? No. Then let me keep my peace. * * *

I forgot in speaking of Listz to mention how he received his rank of Commander. When he paid his last visit here he was commanded to play at the Tuileries. After he had executed his pieces, the French Emperor said to the Master of Ceremonies, "Give him a gold snuff-box with my cypher in diamonds." The Master of Ceremonies replied: "Sir, that will never do for an artist of Listz's talents. He will regard it as a slight." The French Emperor replied: "Very well, then. Go tell him he is promoted a step in the Legion of Honor." It was not then known that Listz was grand officer in the Legion of Honor, and it is said the French Emperor was sensibly vexed when he found he had made a mere instrumental performer a commander in the Legion of Honor. Listz was in the South of France a few days since. He came on a visit to his widower son-in-law, Mons. Olivier, the well-known deputy.—"Spiridion's" Paris Letters in the Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electropathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathize with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required! All letters answered with promptness and with pleasure, if directed to

CURE YOUR COLD!
SAVE YOUR LUNGS!

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP
HAS CURED THOUSANDS!

—AND—
IT WILL CURE YOU!

"A Cough is generally the effect of a cold which has either been improperly treated or entirely neglected. When it proves obstinate, there is always reason to fear the consequences, as this shows a weak state of the lungs, and is often the forerunner of consumption."—Buchan's Domestic Medicine.

STOP THAT COUGHING!

Some of you can't, and we pity you. You have tried every remedy but the one destined by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure; but

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP!

Is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by its surprising curative powers.

WHAT KILLED HIM?

Dr. Hall, in his Journal of Health, speaking of the death of Washington Irving, asks the above question, and adds: "He might well have remained with us for some years to come had it not been for advice, kindly intended, no doubt, but given in thoughtlessness and reckless ignorance."

HE HAD A COLD!

Which, by some injudicious prescription, had been converted into Asthma." Let me say to Dr. Hall, that "prescription" was not

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP.

Keep it in the house—use it freely—give it to your children upon the slightest indication of a cold, and you will think and speak of it as all do who have become acquainted with its merits.

A THING OF BEAUTY
IS A JOY FOR EVER!

And the choicest attribute of beauty is a fine complexion. Oriental travellers note with rapture

THE DAZZLING BEAUTY

of complexion possessed by the Persian Ladies, and state that it is due solely to the use of a toilet preparation in great repute among them. The secret of this preparation has always been zealously guarded, but, by a singular chance, came into the possession of Mr. W. B. Champlin, who now offers it to the public under the name of

and invites attention to its rare merits.

IT WILL NOT INJURE THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL softens the roughest skin. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes all blemishes. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL removes tan and freckles. CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL repairs the ravages of time and restores the pearly tint and roseate hue of youth. No lady should be without this invaluable beautifier.

B. A. HENRICKSEN'S
PATENT CHIMNEY TOP.

THIS useful invention is confidently recommended in all cases where it is desirable to create a great draft.

ON STEAMSHIPS

Its use will dispense with the use of the blower and the tall smoke stack, as it causes the furnace to consume the smoke. It has been successfully used on steamers, in San Francisco. The proprietor has permission to refer to Chas. McIntosh, Esq., as to its value on steamers.

FOUNDRIES AND MACHINE SHOPS,

And all works requiring a great heat will find it of immense benefit. Stephen Guiverwell and Lyon & Co., Brewers, are now using it, and to them I refer.

ON SAILING VESSELS

It has been used to great advantage, where, on account of hailing winds, it is difficult to keep fire in the galley.

FOR SMOKY CHIMNEYS

It is a sure cure, and has been used on the Russ House and other first-class buildings in this city.

FOR VENTILATION,

It is unexcelled, and is recommended to architects and owners of buildings where ventilation is required.

FOR MINING PURPOSES

It is well adapted, thoroughly removing all foul air from shafts and tunnels.

The proprietor also refers to the following gentlemen, who have used it: Capt. Lassen, brig Crimea; Dr. Nuttall, Calhoun & Son, Printers; Edgerly & Wickman, Ship Chandelers; J. B. Quintin, builder; Philip Caduc, Esq.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FIFTEENTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

HENRY TOOMY, Plaintiff; vs. JAMES H. RAY, Defendant.—Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES H. RAY, Defendant.—You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the Service on you of this Summons—If served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise, within Forty Days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to recover in U. S. gold coin, the sum of $946, alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff upon a certain promissory note, and upon an account stated, as set forth and alleged, in plaintiff's complaint, with interest on said sum of $946, at the rate of two per cent. per month, from May 25th, 1864, and costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will take judgment against you, payable in U. S. gold coin for said sum of $946, and interest as aforesaid and costs.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 19th day of December, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

TWO PICTURES FROM THE WAR.

ALL through the wearying summer day,
The blaze of heat, the dusty road,
Our toiling columns stretch away,
Sore burdened with the knapsack's load—
And winding o'er the rugged hills
Bright waves of steel roll hallowing on,
Till War's stern, solemn splendor fills
Dark valleys from the world withdrawn.

Day wanes apace: the failing feet
Have respite from the toilsome track,
Uncounted eyes in slumber sweet
Close round the welcome bivouac.
The picket skirts the distant wood,
And from the far-off summits glow
Dim warnings in the solitude,
Tho' watch-fires of a crafty foe,

To-morrow's dawn may bring the strife,
The shock of battle; yet the sleep
That chains this throbbing tide of life
Is like a spell, so wild and deep.
Dreams soothe each stormy, turbulent breast,
The happy past returns again,
Joy sits within the heart, a guest
To banish thence corroding pain.

God guard and keep them! O'er the hills,
Far reaching to their Northern homes,
My yearning aspiration thrills,
And on the haunted night-wind comes
The whisper of a porch rose-twined,
A graveled walk, an open door,
A lattice sweetly jessamin'd—
A shadow falling on the floor!

Sad woman's eyes; and bearded lips
Beside the bivouac murmur low,
As if the dream had found eclipse
In sympathy's deep overflow.
The drowsy clock ticks by the wall
To count the listless hours away—
While rings afar the thrilling call
Of bugles sounding for the fray.

Sweet childish faces gather round,
Sweet infant voices fill the room,
As ever greets her ear the sound
Of childish plaint: "When will he come?"
And she, with marble lip and cheek,
Turns shuddering from the shadowed floor
To stifle words she may not speak—
"Perhaps he comes to us no more!"

AN OBSOLETE INSTITUTION.

THERE is an old, old sound—not the lubricious oyster so called, but another old sound—which, eminently successful in its time as a waker of men and maid servants, has long since become a thing of the past, from which it sometimes dreamily reverberates still, but only as a waker of memories.

I hardly need say that I allude to the sound of the street-door knocker.

If you perambulate any of our fashionable avenues, or deviate from them into their brown-stone tributaries on the right hand or on the left, you will be in an excellent position for observing that none of our modern hall-doors are provided with that romantic old institution, the knocker. Our modern hall-doors are none the more cheerful for that. They have a solemn, not to say sarcophagous expression now, these black walnut slabs, with their polished silver plates and handles that are so suggestive of the undertaker and his "puking done here." You toll a passing bell as you enter these dismal portals, and when they have closed upon you, you half fancy that the man with the screw-driver has thrown himself upon the funeral plank, and is going to upholster you down behind it forever.

It may be that I am prejudiced; it may be that early associations warp the mind; but for me there is a character, an individuality, belonging to the old hall-door knocker that can never attach itself to the hall-door bell. If you would be persuaded of this, take your staff and your scrip now, and your sandal shoon, and make a pilgrimage into the Greenwich district of old New York city. In some of the tortuous windings of this guttery Alsatia, there yet flourishes the green old knocker, clinging, like the faithful ivy, to its weather-beaten oak. I am acquainted with a knocker there, which sticks out at right angles from the door, as if anxious to meet the hand of the comer half way. It has not lain down to rest for many a year—nor to rust. The house to which it belongs is a cobwebby one, apparently of greater age than respectability; a house of many stories, I have no doubt, as that eager old knocker could tell us if it only knew the spirit alphabet, and could communicate its experience to us by raps. There are knockers that glower at you from old doors there, and knockers that smile; and on one door, where there is a bell as well as a knocker, I have noticed that the latter wears a haughty expression of disdain, as if he and the bell did not pull well together.

In the days when the good old knocker flourished, the family could tell by his flourish whom to expect. The milkman (he uttered milk, then, and no yell) had a knock of his own, to have counterfeited which would have been a misdemeanor punishable by maid-servant and broom. The single knock of the postman brought blood to the face, fire to the eye, retrogression to the hoots, hope to the heart, and sundry other things to various localities, according to circumstances connected with the inner life. There was the dainty knock of the swell—of which, taking it in connection with the well-gloved hand that gave it, it would not be too much to say that it resembled the bleat of a lavender kid. The double-knock of the footman had probably a duplex equivocal of its own, mystic as the enigma of the money-lender's three golden balls. At any rate it had the effect of an open sesame of great power; for not only would the door fly open to its thunder, but the neighboring windows would also rattle up in their grooves, and out from them would pop the heads of families, all red-hot to festoon with adjectives of malignity the name of the bloated aristocrat who dared to have a carriage visitor in their street. The dun was known by his knock as surely as the porker is by his grunt; and when the family physician's rat-tat shivered mildly upon the sonorous timber, all the little children jumped up from the floor, and put out their little tongues ready for his hebdomadal inspection.

These were the diversions of the good old knocker. The door-bell that could evoke such emotions is yet nathing.

And here I must incidentally allude to another diversion intimately connected with the door-knocker, albeit one in which that interesting-excrecence had only a passive part. I refer to its deprehension in the dead of the night by surreptitious hands.

Not very many years have elapsed since the chase of the innocuous door-knocker was reckoned among the sports to be legitimately cultivated by the young aspirant for athletic honors. As a healthful and economical recreation, this kind of exercise had its advantages. No retinue of horsemen and hounds was required for its pursuit, nor was it necessary either to inaugurate the sport by the winding of a hunter's horn, or to defer its pleasures for the meteorological conditions of a southerly breeze and a cloudy sky. The cover of night was the only cover in which the game lay, and the dangers of its pursuits were in proportion to the size and vigilance of the policeman popularly, though sometimes erroneously, supposed to be lurking round the corner. As the Indian brave is honored according to the number of grizzly bear's toe-nails depending from his manly nasal cartilage, so was the knocker-hunter distinguished among his compeers in proportion to the quantity of his portal trophies. I knew a man upon whom forty brass knockers had conferred a reputation for life—and yet he died not worth a rap.

There is a chord in some hearts that, like John the footman, or Brigetina the parlor maid, must sometimes fly responsive to the door-knocker. Some such old fiddle-string breathes an æolian strain for me whenever I pass by a particular hall-door in an obscure slum of the city. The door is painted of a dingy green, and upon it there grows a great iron knocker, the hinge-plate of which is cast in the form of a lion's head. The relic reminds me of what happened in a minor city once, when Campobello and another, with myself, sallied out one night, to settle accounts with a scurrilous and pestilent slanderer, whose door-knocker one of the party had vowed to the demon of revenge. Alas, for the arrangements that are human! When we arrived at his door, no knocker discerned we on that hang-dog plank. Forewarned by some foul spy, the scurrilous person had taken in his knocker for the night. Not thus to be thwarted, however, we resolved to turn our attention to the Mayor of that minor city, whose crime consisted of being brother-in-law to the scurrilous person who had taken in his knocker for the night. The door of the Mayor was painted of a dingy green, and upon it there grew a great iron knocker, the hinge-plate of which was cast in the form of a lion's head. You see the association? A twist from the facile elbow of Campobello, a wrench, and a griud, and no tooth ever came cleaner from its native gum than did that door-knocker from the plank upon which it so long had been a fawning parasite. Disastrous would it have been for the police of that one-horse city (their force was three, and what would have been the odds?) had they then made their appearance upon the scene. They forebore to do so, and we were walking triumphantly away when, lo! from a dark archway leaps forth the bounding Mayor—a man of vast size and obesity—and is about to collar Campobello, when he is felled to his mother-mind by a well-planted left-hander from that famous young gladiator. The ground was yet vibrating to his fall as we reached the end of the street—a small hut majestic procession. And I will record, briefly, how, on the following day, one who bore some personal resemblance to Campobello was arrested for the net, and cast ignominiously into a dungeon that occasionally did duty for a cow-shed, if I remember rightly. How he was ultimately admitted to hail, and subsequently tried for the offence—Campobello all the while watching closely the trial, ready to declare himself should the jury be adverse. How an alibi was proved, and the accused man restored in triumph to his high position in society; and how he eventually brought an action against the discomfited proprietor of the knocker for false arrest and imprisonment, and mulcted him in moneys that were paid in gold.

So much for the blessed memories of the hall-door knocker. It is nearly an obsolete institution now, but its warnings were many.—Charles Dawson Shanly in the N. Y. "Leader."

"STUMPY BROWN."

THE following incidents, which are perfectly true, and some, though not all, of which may be verified by a reference to the county newspaper of the period, form a singular passage in the history of crime in England, and cannot be exceeded, we think, in any other. They are derived chiefly from the writer's father, who was personally connected with some of the events recorded in the latter portion of the narrative:

"About forty years since there lived in the town of Woodbridge, in Suffolk, a short, sharp-featured, wiry little man, who apparently had no occupation, but professed to be a farm-laborer, and really got his living principally by poaching. His proper name was Richard Brown, but the townsfolk of Woodbridge, from some fancy or other, probably on account of his short stature, had changed the Richard into Stumpy, and by that name he was always known. Every one was afraid of Stumpy Brown; he lived in the outskirts of the town on the Martlesome road, and rarely troubled himself to converse much with his neighbors. When he did, it was generally to dispose of a hare, or game of some description, which he nearly always had in stock. His dress, in addition to the knee-breeches of the period, and the usually bright-colored vest, was a long brown coat of very shabby appearance, and a loose felt hat, which he wore over his forehead, while his cold, gray eyes glanced malignantly from under its brim. No one could say any harm of Brown, beyond that he was a surly, ill-conditioned sort of fellow, who shunned his neighbors, and was a known poacher, but yet there were suspicions and rumors abroad about him, which, if true, would have brought him to the gallows.

"Some few years before the time of which I speak, three murders had occurred at various intervals in the neighborhood of Woodbridge, which, considering the nature and size of the town, was a very startling circumstance. Of none of these was the perpetrator known. An officer of a regiment quartered in Woodbridge had been drinking in the Red Lion public-house on the Martlesome Road; he had been seen and recognized here; on the following morning he was found in a ditch near by, his throat cut, and his pockets empty. The captain of a Norwegian trading-vessel, then lying in the port, after he had been missing for ten days, was found in a putrescent condition at the bottom of the river tied up in a sack, without the least clue as to where or by whom he had been murdered. Lastly, a farmer of the name of Aighton, whose property was in the neighborhood, was known to have gone into Woodbridge on the market day; he did not return home in the evening, but on the following morning his body was found in a barn by the side of the road behind the town, which it was necessary for him to traverse on his way back. His head had been hattered in, apparently by some blunt instrument, and his pocket rifled. More attention appears to have been excited by this murder than the two former cases. The officers and the captain were strangers in the town, and with regard to the Norwegian skipper's case, it was the general opinion that some of the vessel's crew were connected with the matter. But in this instance, the victim was no stranger. Farmer Aighton was well-known and respected in Woodbridge, and had been seen and spoken to by many of his friends on the very day of his assassination. The inquest was held as in the two other cases, but no evidence was adduced as to the author of the crime.

"Justice appears to have been tardy in those times, at any rate in that quarter of the world; now-a-days it would indeed astonish us should three undiscovered murders spread their dark shadows of suspicion and fear over a single small town within the course of ten years. Although no evidence had been brought before the authorities, tending to inculcate any individual with the murder of Aighton, yet the finger of suspicion, as directed by the good people of Woodbridge, pointed to Stumpy Brown. He was known to have poached on the farmer's grounds, and had been prosecuted by him, and threatened with a second summons. Stumpy was a sour-mothed fellow, and had been heard to say that he would 'do for' any person who interfered with what he considered his privileges, and in consequence of this, many farmers and neighbors had refrained from prosecuting Brown, absolutely through fear. Hence it was thought not improbable that Stumpy Brown had murdered Farmer Aighton to prevent him executing his threat of a second summons. Time passed on, and people forgot their suspicions concerning Brown. When I was a boy in the town, about forty years since, Stumpy was regarded by the more sensible folks as a character, a queer, sulky old fellow, but no credit was given to the rumors of his being a murderer. "I was apprenticed to a doctor in the town, and being fond of fishing and shooting whenever I could steal the time, managed to make the acquaintance of old Brown, who always knew where a hare was, or an old pike. He seemed to take a fancy to me, and many a summer's evening have I spent with him fishing in the river. One evening I remember well walking with him at the back of the town. I never gave the least credence to the reports about Stumpy, and therefore had no hesitation in referring to the murder.

"Ah," said I, pointing to a part of the road, "that's where they murdered Aighton, isn't it?"

"Brown started a little, and said: 'I wish, sir, you wouldn't talk on them sort of things that arn't pleasant. I never heerd much about it, never heerd much. I suppose that be the place, as they say so, but my opinion is that that's farther along, not that I should know about it.'

"I often heard him muttering to himself, and once found him staring into Kyson Dock in a very intent manner. I startled him by my appearance, and he said: 'That's deep down there, sir, very deep. That would easily drown a man, especially if he wur tied up.' And then he laughed.

"I recall these circumstances now, but at the time I thought nothing of them. Towards the end of the year 1830, the small-pox broke out in Woodbridge with great violence, as it did in many towns of East Anglia at that period. All the help and care that could be obtained were required for the hundreds of patients who were daily carried off by this terrible disease. My master and I had the greater part of the work to do. A pest-house was established, and the individuals appointed to take charge of it, to receive the patients, and superintend the nursing, were Stumpy Brown and his wife.

"Old Mrs. Brown, whom I have not yet mentioned, had been wedded to Stumpy forty years, and I always considered her an honest old woman. When the pest broke out, Stumpy and his wife were getting old folks, the marks of sixty winters' wear being upon them. I, however, found Brown an excellent assistant at the pest-house, as he seemed to possess a very great amount of sang froid in dealing with dead bodies, which is a valuable quality. Although, as we before said, among the educated of the townspeople, no more was thought of the rumor that Brown had murdered Aighton, yet the lower classes still feared him.

"Mrs. Brown had all along shared the same dislike as her husband. It was said that she had the 'evil eye,' that she was a witch, and various other disagreeable things. When, therefore, the doctor placed my old acquaintance Brown and his wife in charge of the pest-house, it was not wonderful that many of the poor were afraid of going there, and tried hard to be allowed to remain in their own homes. A Mrs. Fitch, whose husband was smitten with the disease, and was to be sent to the pest-house, begged hard that he should not go. 'He knows, sir, that of Brown that 'ood hang 'im,' she said, 'and that's sartin he'll never come out alive.' But of course no heed could be paid to this, and Fitch went. In two days he became much worse, and said he should like to see the clergyman before he died. The doctor passed with me on our regular round, and I despatched Brown for the curate of the parish. Fitch would last another day, we both thought, and, leaving him with Mrs. Brown, went into the next ward. When the clergyman came, Fitch was dead. I went up to study in London after the epidemic had passed away, and forgot Stumpy Brown and Woodbridge until the following facts were narrated to me about seven years afterwards:

"It appeared that a man of the name of Green was charged at Woodbridge with burglary. This man I knew was an old companion of Brown's, and seemed always to have a sort of very mysterious connection with them. When awaiting his trial, he wrote to Brown that unless he came and swore to an alibi for him, he would 'let him (Brown) kuow.' Brown did not come forward, and accordingly when in prison Green turned king's evidence, and implicated old Stumpy in the murder of farmer Aighton. It was nearly thirty years since the murder occurred, and Brown was now a feeble old man. Whether it was on account of his old age, and the time which had elapsed since the murder, or whether in default of evidence, I cannot say, but Brown, who was tried at Bury Assizes, was convicted of aggravated manslaughter only, and sentenced to penal servitude for the remainder of his days. The ship in which he was to have gone to Botany Bay was one of the last convict transports which left England. It was wrecked in the Channel off Boulogne, and all on board were drowned. Then one of the mysterious murders was explained in the person of my old acquaintance, and expiated.

"Mrs. Brown did not long survive her husband. As she lay on her death-bed she said to the doctor, 'I should like to speak to some one before I go.' The clergyman was sent for, but when he came the old woman raised herself in her bed and said, 'That's no use in your coming here, that's no good you can do me. It's the magistrate I want.' After this, she relapsed for some time, and with her last energy said, 'I ha' got summut to tell yer afore I die. Stumpy's gone, and so shall I be soon, so that don't matter. You know the officer as was murdered and robbed close by the Martlesome Lion?—I and Stumpy ha' done that. [A pause.] Yer know the cap'tain what was found in a sack?—I and Stumpy put 'im in. We drugged 'im first, and then took his money and sewed 'im up. Fitch saw Stumpy put 'im in the river, but he dursen't tell, 'cause Stumpy said he'd do the same for him if he did. When you sent for the clergyman when Fitch was a-dying, Stumpy says to me, says he, 'He's a going to blab, you best stop 'im.' I knowed what he meant, and so I stuck the pillow on his face, after you were gone. He went off quite easy and naterel-like, and he hadn't long to live anyways. That's all about Fitch. [Another pause.] Stumpy killed owld Aighton 'cause he prosecuted 'im, and that war'n't likely he would stand that. Stumpy's drowned, so yer can't git him, and I ain't fur off dying. I can die more quiet-like, now I have loosed my mind. That's getting that cold now, I feel as if that were a kind o' smothering me. Oh! Lord! And thus the old woman died. No great publicity was given to Mrs. Brown's confession, and to many the Woodbridge murders are still a mystery."

SCENE ON A STEAMER.

[HORACE SMITH, one of the authors of Rejected Addresses, pictures the following amusing scene as occurring on board an English steamer among rich people going to France.]

"BLESS my heart! Mrs. Suet here! Ah, Mrs. Hog-gins, how d'ye do? Dear me! Mrs. Sweetbread, and Mrs. Cleaver, too! Why, we shall have the whole of Whitechapel on board presently. I believe," said the voluble dame, looking round with a gracious and comprehensive smile, "I believe we are all butcher's ladies."

"I believe we are no such a thing, ma'am," cried a corpulent female with an oleaginous face, while, trying to turn up her pug-nose, which, however, was kept tolerably steady by a tripple chin, she waddled away to another part of the vessel.

"Well, I'm sure! Marry come up! Hoity, toity!" burst from the coterie with which she had disclaimed carnifical affinity; "here's airs for you!" "And her veil's only bobbinet lace," cried one. "And them fine car-rings is only gilt, I warrant ye," said another.

"Well, I do declare, there's neighbor Croak, the undertaker, with his long, woe-begone phiz; it gives one quite the blue-devils to look at him. I say, Croak, who is that stuck-up fat thing that just left us?"

"Don't you know her?" inquired Croak, in a whisper. "Why, that's Mrs. Dip, the great tallow-chandler's lady, of Norton Falgate."

"Well, suppose she is, she needn't turn her nose up at us; if we were to call upon her on melting-day, we might have something to turn up our noses at, I fancy, ha, ha, ha! Lauk! how serious you look; she isn't a friend of yours, is she?"

"I never laughs at any body," replied the prudent Mr. Croak, "for in our line every body's liable to become a customer. Your poor brother Joe, ma'am, made a very pretty corpse. I dare say, when he was settling off on that water-party, as we may be now, he little thought he was to be drowned, and who knows what may happen to us this very day?"

"La! Mr. Croak, you're quite shocking: worse than a screech-owl; I wonder you could join a party of pleasure."

"Pleasure, indeed!" cried Croak, with a sardonic grin, followed by a groan; "brother Tom lies dead at Calais, and one wouldn't give the job to strangers, you know, being in one's own line."

"Is poor Tom gone at last? You used to call him Silly Tom, didn't you?"

"No," said Croak, surlily, "I always called him Tom Fool."

"Well, but he has left you and George something, hasn't he?"

"Yes," replied the undertaker, giving his lower jaw a still more lugubrious expression, "he has bequeathed to one of us the payment of his debts, and to the other the care of his children."

"Well, well, Mr. Croak, it ought, at all events, to make you happy, that you've now got a fair excuse for being miserable."

"I'll take your bundle, young gentleman," said the ship's steward, addressing a youth by my side, who, I found was Mrs. Cleaver's son, and whose sallow complexion, spindle legs, lank hair, squinting eyes, and look of impudent cunning, proclaimed him, at the same time, a genuine of the City.

"No but you von't though," said the young Cockney, holding his bundle behind him; "I understands trap; I'm up to snuff and a pinch above it; I'm not to be diddled in that there way. I suppose you thought mother and I was going to pay a crown apiece for our dinner; but we don't stand no nonsense, for I've got a cold beefsteak and inguns in this here 'ankerchief, and that, with a glass of brandy and vater cold, aront sugar, is vat I call a prime spread."

"Bravo, Dick!" said the delighted mother, winking at her son; "if they can take you it, I give them leave. As I hope to be saved, here's Mr. Smart, the tanner!" Well, now we shall have some fun."

"Ladies," cried the facetious Mr. Smart, sliding forward his foot, and making a bow of mock ceremony, "your most hydrostatic and humble-enn-tumble!"

"There you go, Mr. Smart, as droll as ever, always beginning the conversation with 'a repartee. Did you hear that, Mrs. S.? That was a good one, wasn't it, Mrs. H.?"

"That there tower, mother," said Dick, with a sagacious nod, "was built by William the Conqueror; I vonder why they stuck hoyster shells all over it."

"I suppose," cried Mr. Smart, "to show that he astonished the natives in more ways than one—ha! ha! ha!"

Dick laughed, though he didn't know why; and, pulling up his neckcloth, proceeded to give his mother a lesson in English history:

"It vas his dad, you know, that vas called Villiam Rufus, on account of his black 'airs, and vas shot by a well-directed harrow, vich vent right through 'is 'art—"

"Aud fell at Harrow on the Hill," cried Mr. Smart, "whence it took its name—ha! ha! ha!"

"Excuse me, Mrs. Cleaver, but your son has picked up a little of the Cockney pronunciation."

"Not more, sir, than a young man should have, who means to live all his life in the city. He went to a very good school."

"And master vasn't a coxcomb," added Dick, "about his Wees and Haitches."

RULES IN MAKING PRESENTS.

IF the present is to be very exquisite indeed, and no mortification will be mixed up with the receipt of it, out of pure inability to make an equal one, or from any other cause, the rule has often been laid down. It should be something useful, beautiful, costly, and rare. It is generally an elegance, however, to omit the costliness. The rarity is the great point; because riches themselves cannot always command it, and the peculiarity of the compliment is the greater. Rare present to a rare person.

If you are rich, it is a good rule in general to make a rich present; that is to say, one equal, or at least not dishonorable, to your means: otherwise you set your riches above your friendship and generosity; which is a mean mistake.

Among equals, it is a good rule not to exceed the equality of resources; otherwise there is a chance of giving greater mortification than pleasure, unless to a mean mind; and it does not become a generous one to care for having advantages over a mind like that.

But a rich man may make a present far richer than can be made him in return, provided the receiver be as generous and understanding as he, and knows that there will be no mistake on either side. In this case, an opportunity of giving himself great delight is afforded to the rich man; and he can only have or bestow it under those circumstances.

On the other hand, a poor man, if he is generous, and understood to be so, may make the very poorest of presents, and give it an exquisite value; for his heart and his understanding will accompany it; and the very daring to send his straw will show that he has a spirit above his means, and such as could bestow and enrich the costliest present. But the certainty of his being thus generous, and having this spirit, must be very great. It would be the miserablest and most despicable of all mistakes, and in all probability the most self-betraying too, to send a poor present under a shabby pretence.

With no sort of presents must there be pretence. People must not say (and say falsely) that they could get no other, or that they could afford no better; nor must they affect to think better of the present than it is worth; nor, above all, keep asking about it after it is given—how you like it, whether you find it useful, etc.

It is often better to give no present at all than one beneath your means—always, should there be a misgiving on the side of the bestower.

One present in the course of a life is generosity from some: from others, it is but a sacrifice made to avoid giving more.

To receive a present handsomely and in a right spirit, even when you have none to give in return, is to give one in return.

We must not send presents to strangers (except of a very common and trifling nature, and not without some sort of warrant even then), unless we are sure of our own right and good motives in sending it, and of the right and inclination, too, which they would have to permit themselves to receive it: otherwise we pay both parties a very ill compliment, and such as no modest and honorable spirit on either side would venture upon. There might, it is true, be a state of society in which such ventures would not be quite so hardy: and it is possible, meanwhile, that a very young and enthusiastic nature, in its ignorance of the perplexities that at present beset the world, might here and there hazard it: but probably a good deal of self-love would be mixed up with the proceeding. The only possible exception would be in the case of a great and rare genius, which had a right to make laws to itself, and to suppose that its notice was acquaintanceship sufficient.—From "The Seer," by Leigh Hunt.

CHAPTER XI.

A VERY OLD STORY.

MRS. BURFIELD was a pale-faced and pinched-looking person, hollow-cheeked and spare of figure, who in these latter days would have inspired a stranger with the idea that she was a rigid disciplinarian of the school founded by Mr. Banting. She looked as if all saccharine and fatty elements had been carefully excluded from her food; and yet, on the other hand, she had none of the muscular energy which might be supposed to result from a carnivorous habit. She was a depressing kind of woman, with thin locks of whity-brown hair dangling upon each side of her thin face, and thin garments hanging limply upon her scanty figure, and a thin voice. There was something in Mrs. Burfield's appearance which called up vague images of drizzly days, and patterns, and washing done at home, and a man in the passage clamorous for a water rate, and all the most unpleasant associations of poverty.

She was a woman who prefaced every sentence she uttered with a sigh. She sighed as she admitted to Mr. Tredethlyn that her name was Burfield, as if even that fact were in some manner affliction. She sighed as she told him, apologetically, that the house was full of lodgers, so she must ask him to step down into the little sitting-room below stairs. And yet, as she subsisted by the letting of lodgings, the crowded state of her house should have been a cause for rejoicing.

Francis had some slight difficulty in conveying his long legs down the narrow little staircase, in which there was a break-neck corner, whence awkward maid-servants were wont to precipitate themselves head-long in company with an avalanche of tea-things; but he managed to find his way down somehow or other, and was ushered into a little faded-looking under-ground parlor, where all the furniture seemed to have undergone a prolonged course of Bantling, and where the evidence of children's habitation was untidily visible in every direction. The children were all at school, however, Mrs. Burfield told Francis, with another sigh; though, as she added directly afterwards that they drove her next door to ravaging madness when they were at home, that fact need scarcely have depressed her.

"I had a governess for them some time back," she said, unconsciously approaching the subject of Mr. Tredethlyn's business with her, "and the young person was very useful to me in many ways; but things have been so dull, and lodgers so uncertain, and so close as to rent and kitchen fire, and such like, that I couldn't afford to engage another young person, if I could have found any one as reasonable and as willing as her, which wasn't likely."

Here Mrs. Burfield sighed again, and to her surprise found herself echoed by her visitor.

"It is about that person, the governess, that I have come to inquire," said Francis. "I have reason to believe, I may say that I am almost sure, she is my cousin—very near and very dear to me. Pray tell me all you can about her. I am a rich man, and I am looking for my cousin, who has a better claim than I have to the money that has lately come to me. Pray tell me everything—you shall not find me ungrateful. I will make it well worth your while to help me in this matter."

It might be supposed that Mrs. Burfield, being ground into the very dust by the iron heel of poverty, would brighten a little on hearing this promising speech; but she did nothing of the kind, she only sighed rather more plaintively than usual, and remarked somewhat irrelevantly that her boys were beginning to grow up now, and the boots they knocked out, and the way they wore their things at the knees and elbows, were something awful.

"Tell me all you can about my cousin, urged Mr. Tredethlyn. "Ah, you don't know how long I have been away from England, and how eager I am to find that poor desolate girl. Pray tell me all you know, and quickly."

"It's a long story," said Mrs. Burfield, in the very words used by the grocer—"it's a long story, and goodness knows the rights or the wrongs of it; but if you are her cousin—and you are, I suppose—"

"I do not think there can be any doubt of it," Francis Tredethlyn answered, eagerly, "I do not think there can be any doubt that the person of whom I have heard this morning was my cousin, Susan Tredethlyn."

"The young person to whom I alluded called herself Susan Turner."

"Yes, yes. It is only natural she should change her name. She left her home because she had been very much persecuted there. She was no doubt afraid of being taken back, and was anxious to hide herself under a false name."

"If I had known that she had come to me under a false name, never would she have slept a night in this house," exclaimed Mrs. Burfield, with something between a sigh and a shudder.

"She was a good and honest girl, under whatever name she came to you," answered Francis Tredethlyn, "but pray tell me the story."

But Mrs. Burfield could not immediately comply with this request; she had to go into the kitchen first, to see that "the girl" was basting some mutton that was being roasted for a very fastidious "front parlor," who had a rooted objection to baked meats; and then she had to go out into a little area, in which the window looked out, and to hold parley with some person above, who dropped her down divers loaves, and disputed with her as to a certain "twopenny German," which had been had, or had not been had, on the previous Tuesday. At last, however, she was able to seat herself opposite poor Francis, and to begin her story, from the narration of which she seemed to derive a dismal kind of enjoyment.

"It's close upon seven years since my poor dear husband died," Mrs. Burfield began, and for some little time Francis Tredethlyn was afraid that she was going to favor him with a sketch of her own personal history, rather than that story which he was so eager to know. "It's close upon seven years, seven years of toil and trouble for me, and up to that time I'd never known what it was to want for anything, in a moderate way. He was managing clerk in an insurance office, sir, and was as fine a looking man as you need wish to see; but he was taken—sudden—and I was left alone to provide for four young children. Well, sir, I tried one thing and another, but being genteelly brought up, things seemed to go harder with me than they go with some people; and at last an uncle, on my mother's side, who is very wealthy, and lately retired from the patent chimney-pot business, gave me enough to buy a little furniture, and start fresh down here. 'It's been a hard life, sir, but I shouldn't have so much minded that if it hadn't been for the children; I couldn't bear to see them running wild upon the shore, or playing with vulgar, dirty children on the waste ground; so, a little better than four years ago, I thought I'd try if I couldn't get a person to take care of them, who'd be a kind-of governess to them, and would give me a helping hand with the house when my lodgings were full, and wouldn't want above a few pounds a year, just to get herself a new gown once in a way, and so on. Well, sir, I inquired for such a person, but for! you might just as well inquire for anything you wanted on Robinson Crusoe's island as at Coltonslough, unless it's Queen's taxes and poor rates, and you can have plenty of them without asking. So at last some one says to me—I think it was Mr. Sanders at the post-office,—'Why don't you advertise in the Times, Mrs. Burfield? it'll cost you a trifle, but you're sure to get what you want.' So the long and the short of it was, I did advertise for a genteel person who would undertake to teach young children, and, make herself generally useful, in consideration of a comfortable home and a honorarium of ten pounds per annum. Mr. Sanders advised me to put it in the light of a honorarium, as he said it looked more that way. A young person from the country preferred, I stated in the advertisement, for the things that lodgers from London bring down with their luggage, and then turn round upon you and object to the bedding, had quite set me against Londoners. Well, sir, I got a good many answers, but the best written letter was signed Susan Turner. So I wrote to Miss Turner—the address was at a little coffee-house near the Great Western terminus—and I told her that if she liked to come down to Coltonslough for an interview, I would pay her expenses one way. Well, she came, and I found her a very pleasant-spoken, respectable-looking young person, and I took to her at first sight to that degree, that I allowed her to come to me without references, she being at variance, as she told me, with her relations in the country."

"She came to you at once, then?"

"Yes, she stayed with me there and then, not caring to go back to London, the strangeness of which frightened her, she said; and she had no luggage, except a little bit of a carpet bag, full of things, which she sent for next day; and then by-and-by the truth came out, that she'd run away from home. But she had a couple of sovereigns, and she went out and bought herself a few more things, and made herself as neat and comfortable as she could. She didn't make much secret of how she'd left her home, poor girl. Her father had wanted her to marry against her own wishes, she said, and in her fear of him she had run away."

"Poor girl! poor girl!"

"Well, sir," sighed Mrs. Burfield, "we got on very comfortably for some months. I never met a young person more kind or more willing. The children took to her as if she'd been their own sister, and she was altogether the steadiest, most industrious young person. Things had gone pretty comfortable with me that season, and in the autumn, quite late, going on for November, when people don't expect to see a single lodger in all Coltonslough, what should I hear, one afternoon, but the wheels of a fly, and a tremendous double knock at my door; and who should I see when I opened it, but a tall, handsome-looking gentleman, who walked straight into my parlor, and took the rooms, off-hand, and without so much as inquiring what the terms would be, which, considering the haggling and beating down I'd been accustomed to in the very best part of the season, seemed almost like a dream."

Mrs. Burfield had warmed with her subject, and had refrained for some time from the relief of a sigh; but she paused now to indulge herself in a very heavy one, and then, after a general disquisition upon the sorrows of a lodging-house keeper, went on:

"He really was one of the handsomest, easiest-spoken gentlemen I ever met with, and he seemed to take away one's breath almost. He had such a dashing kind of way with him, that, if you'd have shut your eyes, you'd almost have fancied him on horseback, galloping away for dear life. He seemed all upon the prance, as it were, if I may use the observation. 'Now I dare say you'll want references,' he said, 'and if so, I can't give you any without putting myself to more trouble than I care about. But you can have some rent in advance, if that'll do, and I've no end of luggage, if that'll do.' And then he flung himself into one of the arm-chairs, and burst out laughing when it creaked and groaned, as it were, under him; for lodgers have no more feeling for an unprotected female's furniture than if they was so many Ojibway Indians, and I can't deny that the parlor chairs were uncertain; but I didn't mind the strange gentleman making game of them, somehow, for he had such a pleasant way with him, and showed his white teeth, and looked so handsome, that he seemed quite to brighten up the place."

"Well," he said, presently, "can you guess why I came to Coltonslough in the month of November?" And of course I told him no, I couldn't, not having the pleasure of being acquainted with him. Upon which he burst out laughing again. 'I came here,' he said, 'because I was told Coltonslough was about the dullest place upon the surface of the earth, and I mean to stay here till after Christmas. So you may tell the man outside to bring in my luggage, and look sharp about it.' Upon which the flyman brought in a couple of big portmantaus, and a gun-case and a hat-box, and two of the heaviest trunks that ever came into my passage. 'Books, ma'am, books, every one of them, and all as heavy as lead,' said the young gentleman, as the corners of the boxes went scratching and bumping upon the paper—and the way lodgers' boxes do scratch and bump an unprotected female's paper is something awful. But for all that I wasn't sorry to see plenty of luggage, though the books might have been brickbats, neatly packed in hay, as has been known to happen in this very terrace. 'Well, ma'am,' says the gentleman, when his luggage had all been brought in and the flyman paid, 'now I can settle down comfortably. Do I look as if I'd been plucked, do you think, ma'am?' he asked, looking at me very hard, and sticking his hands deep down in his pockets, which was one of those ways of his that I venture to call prancing. I didn't quite catch his meaning, but I thought he alluded to something unpleasant, so I said, 'No, indeed, I should think not.' 'But I have, ma'am,' he answered, looking at me in a measuring sort of a way, as if I'd been a five-barred gate, and he was just going to fly clean over me; and that measuring look of his was another of his galloping ways. 'But I have been plucked, ma'am,' he said, 'as clean as any fowl that they ever send you home from the poulterer's. I'm a featherless biped, ma'am. So I've come down to Coltonslough, being, as I understand, the dullest hole upon the earth's crust, and I mean to go in a perisher.' A 'perisher' was his expression. 'And I mean to read like old boots, so you may let your servant light me a fire, ma'am, and get me some chops; for I suppose I must resign myself to an existence sustained upon chops so long as I'm at Coltonslough.'"

Once more Mrs. Burfield stopped to take breath. Francis Tredethlyn listened in silence, with a moody frown upon his face. Already he hated this man, of whose share in his cousin's history he was yet ignorant. He felt as we feel sometimes at a play, when we see the villain first appear upon the stage, and know he is a villain, yet do not know what his special crime is to be.

"Well, sir, of all the pleasant lodgers that ever darkened a widow's doors, the plucked young gentleman was the pleasantest. He got up early, and went to his books and papers as soon as he was dressed, and had chops and strong green tea for breakfast; and he sat at his books all day, till it was too dark for him to sit any longer, and then he went and strolled up and down the Esplanade, smoking for an hour or so, and then he came in and had more chops, cold brandy and water, for his dinner, except when I took the liberty of roasting him a fowl, or getting some other little nicety, just by way of variety; and then, after dinner, he went to his books and papers again, and sat up till very late, reading and writing and drinking strong green tea."

"But my cousin Susan," cried Francis. He was getting impatient under this minute description of the lodger's habits. "What has all this to do with my cousin?"

"I'm coming to that," Mrs. Burfield answered, with a sigh that was more profound than usual. "You see, sir, it happened at this time, being the end of the season, and Coltonslough as empty as it could be, it happened that we were without a servant, so myself and Susan Turner took it in turns to wait upon the young gentleman. Not that I ever asked her to do anything that you can call menial, but she'd take him up his tea, and clear away his dinner things, and light his candles for him, and such like; and knowing her to be a respectable young woman, I didn't keep that sharp watch over her that some folks might have done. If she stopped ten minutes or so in his room, talking to him, I usen't to think anything about it—you can hear almost every sound in these houses, and it was quite pleasant to hear her soft voice and his laugh ringing out every now and then. He wasn't the sort of gentleman you could suspect of any harm, he had such a happy kind of way with him, as if he was good friends with himself and all the world. He lent Susan books—books of poetry, with all sorts of pencil-writing upon the edges of them; and I used sometimes to fancy Susan cared more for the pencil writing than she did for the poetry itself, she'd sit and pore over it so when the children were gone to bed, and we were alone in this room. Sometimes the plucked young gentleman would come down here of an evening to fetch himself another candle, or to tell us that he'd let his fire out, or something of that kind, for he wasn't a bit proud; and then, instead of going back directly, he'd sit down, and make himself as much at home as if he had lived among us all his life; and, oh dear me, sir, how he would talk! all about books and poetry, and the foreign places he'd seen, and plays, and music, and writers, and actors and singers. He seemed to know everything in the world. So you see, one way and another, he saw a good deal of Susan, for I found out afterwards, from the children, that when he went out in the dusk to smoke his cigar he generally contrived to meet her, and then he'd walk with her and the children till it was time for them to go in-doors. She was a good girl, and she wasn't the girl to throw herself in his way. If they were much together it was because he followed her. I might have known the meaning of his sitting in this room for hours together of a night, but he had such a natural way of doing everything that it threw one off one's guard, somehow."

"The scoundrel!" muttered Francis Tredethlyn, between his clenched teeth. "But you haven't told me his name. I want to know his name."

"He'd been with us more than a fortnight before ever I asked him what his name was, and then somehow or other the question came up, and he said his name was Lesley—Robert Lesley; but somehow looking back upon it afterwards, it seemed to me as if he hesitated a little before he said the name. Well, things went on as comfortable as possible for more than two months, and then he went away, taking all his luggage with him, and paying me very liberal for everything he'd had, besides half-a-crown apiece to the children, which at that time of year came very welcome, and of course I took it from them immediately to go towards their new boots. He went away; and as I thought, somehow, he'd had a kind of a liking for Susan, and Susan for him, I half expected the poor girl would fret a little when he was gone; but she didn't, and looking at her sometimes as she sat at work opposite to me, I used to fancy there was a kind of happy smile like upon her face. She'd been with me six months by this time, and I paid her the little trifle that was due, and what did she do next day but go out and spend ever so much in toys and such like for the children; which, as I told her, was very wrong, considering how badly off she was for clothes. But she made no answer, except to look at me with the same smile I'd seen so often on her face since Mr. Lesley had gone."

"Poor girl—poor, helpless, innocent girl!"

The dark frown melted into a softer expression as Francis Tredethlyn muttered these few broken words. He was no longer thinking of the stranger—the nameless villain of this common story. He was thinking of his cousin Susan's innocent face, with the smile of girlish trustfulness upon it.

"One day, when Mr. Lesley had been gone a little better than three weeks, a letter came for Susan—I'd need to notice it, for it was the first she'd had since she'd been with me. She ran up stairs directly she heard the postman's knock, and took the letter from him with her own hands, and stopped to read it in the passage. She was putting it in her pocket as she came back into this room, and her cheeks were flushed as bright as two red roses, but she didn't say a word about the letter. All that afternoon she seemed in a kind of flutter, and every now and then she would come all over in a tremble, and drop her work in her lap. She was making some pinafores for the boys, and I said to her, 'Susan, what ever is the matter?' but she turned it off somehow, and nothing more was said until after tea, when the children were safe out of the way, and we were sitting alone together. Then I never did see anybody so restless as she was, laying her work down and taking it up again, and fetching a book—one of the books he'd left with her—and opening and shutting it, and then pretending to read, but all in the same restless way; till at last she came suddenly behind my chair, and flung her arms round my neck, and began to sob fit to break her poor loving heart. And it was ever so long before she could get calm enough to say anything; but at last she cried out, 'Oh, Mrs. Burfield, I'm afraid I'm very ungrateful; you've been so good to me, and we've been so happy together.' And so we had; though I do not think, poor tender-hearted dear, she'd gone through as much on account of the taxes as if she'd been the householder instead of me. 'I'm going to leave you, Mrs. Burfield,' she said; 'I'm going to leave you and the children that love me so dearly. I'm going away to be married to Mr. Lesley. I'm to go by the first train to-morrow morning, and he's to meet me at the station, and at eleven o'clock we're to be married.'

"You may guess how she took my breath away when she told me this. But I said, 'Oh, my dear, you can't mean to do anything so mad as go alone to meet Mr. Lesley, who is little better than a stranger to you.' 'A stranger!' she cried out, 'my darling Robert a stranger! Oh, if you only knew how noble he is, and how much he is to give up to marry a poor girl like me!' And then she went on about him as if he'd been something better than a human creature; and having always found him so much the gentleman myself, and so open-hearted and frank in all his ways, I could scarcely do otherwise than believe her. But still I urged her all I could against trusting him. 'Don't go my dear,' I said; 'or, if you must go let me go with you.' But she blushed very red, and said, 'Oh, Mrs. Burfield, the marriage is to be a secret, and I promised Robert again and again that I wouldn't say a word about it to you or any living creature. Only you've been so good to me, and I couldn't bear to go away without telling you the whole truth.' And upon this I begged her still harder not to go away; I told her no good ever came out of secret marriages, and that there was generally something underhand and false at the bottom of them that brought about all kinds of trouble and suffering afterwards. And I told her how Mr. Burfield married me publicly in St. Pancras' Church, and would have his two sisters—one in pink and one in blue—besides the Miss Parkinses, his first cousins, who were sweetly dressed in green and salmon, to walk after me to the altar. But it was no more use talking to Susan than if she'd been a stone statue, though she sat herself on the little hassock at my feet, and kept crying one minute and smiling the next and talking about her darling Robert, and kissing me till I almost thought her brain was turned. It was no use talking. 'I love him so dearly,' she said, 'and I know how noble and generous he is.' And that was her only argument; and long before daylight the next morning she went away by the early train; and though my heart seemed bleeding for her, I couldn't kiss her when she said good-by, and I couldn't go to the station to see her off. 'No, Susan,' I said, 'if you must go, you must, and I've no power to keep you back, but I'll not take any part in your going.' But I stood at my window to see her go away, and I shall never forget the dark, drizzly morning, with streaks of grey like on one side of the sky, and white, sickly-looking stars on the other, and Susan walking across the waste ground all alone, with the rain driving at her, and the wind beating at her, and a bit of a shabby carpet bag in her hand. It seemed so dreadful to think she was going to be married like that."

"But she did go away?" cried Francis. "She must have come back to you then, for the letter with the Coltonsloough postmark reached her father less than eighteen months ago."

"I am coming to that," answered Mrs. Burfield. "It's about eighteen months ago that she came back to me, looking, oh! so changed, so broken down, that I hadn't the heart to ask her any questions. I could see that all had gone wrong, and I could guess pretty well what kind of wrong it was. She wanted to lodge with me, she said, and would pay me for her lodgings. I could see that she wore a wedding ring on her finger, but she had no other jewelry whatever. She was dressed in black—black silk that had once been very handsome, but which was rusty and shabby then. The first night she came to me she sat up very late writing, and in the morning she went out with a letter in her hand. She was with me more than two months, but that was the last time I ever saw her write. She used to be fond of reading; but now she never took up a book, though Mr. Lesley had left a good many of his books in the little chiffonier in the parlor, thinking to come back, as he told me. She used to be fond of the children; but now she never noticed them, and after a little while they seemed to shrink away from her, as if she was strange to them somehow. For hours and days together she used to sit in the bow-window, watching the road from the station, as if she expected some one. At dusk she would go out and walk upon the Esplanade, just at the time that he used to walk with his cigar. It was the dull season, and there was no one to notice her. At last, about the middle of May, when the visitors began to come to Coltonsloough, she told me one day that she must leave me. I said, 'Was it on account of the lodgings?' because she knew I used to raise the rent at that time of year, and I thought that might be the cause of her wanting to go. But she said, 'Oh, no, no.' She had only had one purpose in stopping so long, and that was in the hope of seeing some one, or getting an answer to a letter she had written, and now there was no longer any hope of that. So I couldn't persuade her to stay any longer, do what I would, and she went away. She had friends in London, she told me, who had promised to put her in the way of getting her own living somehow or other. I kissed her this time willingly enough, poor child, and I went with her, to the station, and I thought her pale face looked almost like a ghost's as she waved her hand to me from the carriage window."

"You're a good woman!" cried Mr. Tredethlyn, half crushing Mrs. Burfield's skinny hand in his strong fingers. "You're a good woman, and you did your best to befriend that poor girl."

Mrs. Burfield sighed, and wiped her eyes with the corner of a rusty black silk apron. The world had been very hard for her; but there was a gentle, womanly haven somewhere in her breast, and Susan Tredethlyn had taken shelter there.

She'd been gone a little over six weeks, when an old gentleman came one morning, and asked to see a girl called Susan. That's how he put it. He was very stern-looking, and he threw me all in a tremble, somehow, with his ways; but I asked him down here, and then, little by little, he made me tell him pretty nearly all I've told you. I couldn't keep anything back from him; he put his questions so fierce and sudden; and every time I hesitated ever so little, he accused me of prevaricating with him, and trying to deceive him. I could see his eyes glaring at me like coals of fire, and his face turned of a bluish white, so that I was almost frightened he'd drop down in a fit. But when he'd got all the story out of me, he stood up as straight and stern as if he'd been only twenty years old, and said: 'No man of my name ever knew what disgrace was until to-day, and may the heaviest curse that ever fell upon a woman's head come down upon my shameful daughter.' He stretched up his two hands—and I shall never forget him as he stood there with his white hair, and the bluish white of his face, and the dreadful glare in his eyes. Then he put on his hat and walked out of the house, taking no more notice of me than if I'd been a stock or a stone. I heard the front door bang to after him, and I ran up-stairs to the parlor window, and saw him walking away towards the station; and that's the last I saw of him."

"Can you remember upon what day this occurred?"

"Yes, I can; for I'd had the parlor lodgers leave me the day before. It was the 29th of June."

The 29th of June! and on the 30th, Oliver Tredethlyn had executed that will which made Francis master of thirty thousand a year. The young man knew now why his uncle had left him a great fortune, and found it still more difficult to feel very grateful to his benefactor.

There was a long pause, during which vengeful thoughts had their full way in the breast of Francis Tredethlyn.

"Can you tell me nothing more of this man," he said presently—"this scoundrel, who called himself Robert Lesley?"

Mrs. Burfield only answered by a hopeless shake of her head.

"He left some books, you say. Was there none among them that would give any clue to who or what he was?"

Again Mrs. Burfield shook her head.

"You're welcome to look at the books," she said; "there's plenty of pencil writing in them, but no name or address—only initials."

She knelt down before a little chiffonier in a corner by the fireplace, and took out a few volumes, some handsomely, some shabbily bound, and placed them before Francis Tredethlyn.

Upon the handsomely bound books the initials "R. L." appeared in a gilded monogram. Four of the volumes were German translations of some recondite classics; but there was a fifth upon which Mr. Tredethlyn fastened eagerly. It was a small flat volume, bound in sheepskin, and fastened with a brass lock—a very superior kind of lock. On the cover was written the one word "Journal."

"Let me have this book," he said, "I'll give you a hundred pounds for it."

Mrs. Burfield's mouth opened with a spasmodic action, and for once in her life she forgot to sigh.

"A hundred pounds!"

"A hundred—two, if you like. Haven't I told you that I'm a rich man? and you've been kind to my cousin. I'll give you the money as a free gift, for the matter of that; but I must have this book. It's a journal, a book in which a man writes a history of his own life. An officer I knew in Van Diemen's Land used to write such a history by fits and starts. How do I know what this may tell me about my cousin? Let me have it. I know the book isn't yours; but there can be no such thing as honor or faith to be kept with such a man as that. Let me have the book."

There was a good deal more said upon the matter, but the end of it was that Francis Tredethlyn went back to London with the sheepskin-covered volume in his pocket; and Mrs. Burfield, retiring to rest after a heavy supper of cold meat and cucumber, dreamt that she had inherited a million of money from one of the Coltonsloough tax-collectors.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JANUARY 14 1865.

OPENING OF THE ART UNION.

ONE of the pleasantest reunions that San Francisco has witnessed in many a long day occurred on Thursday evening last, the occasion being the opening of the "Art Union." For several weeks it had been bruited about that some such thing was in contemplation, and finally came mysterious rumors that it was in progress. Gentlemen renowned for their wealth and the liberality with which they dispense it were seen in conclave, others renowned for taste, and always willing to furnish that important element to further the development of any worthy enterprise if others would furnish the money, held converse together—it was evident that something was in the wind. And by-and-by it came out that we of California had an Art Union of our own; that the possibility of the establishment of an institution for the encouragement of native talent and the exhibition of exotic genius had got beyond being even a probability, being a fixed fact—so much so that invitations were issued to a select few to be present at the opening.

With commendable judgment the Committee located their Gallery in a central portion of the city; with excellent taste it was fitted up with precise adaptation to the purpose for which it was intended. The carpet that covers the floor is the envy of housewives who yield to the seduction of its harmonious colors, the seats are so comfortable and so well arranged that people knowing nothing about art and caring less will gladly rush in and pay twenty-five cents per caput for the privilege of sitting down in them, and the light is so arranged as to exhibit the pictures to the best advantage. Our sprightly cotemporary, the Alta, asserts that "the light comes in the day from the skylight above and at night from numerous gas burners shaded from view;" but in at least the latter portion of the sentence it falls into serious error—right so far as the skylight is concerned, it is fatally wrong in asserting that the gas burners are shaded from view, as they are plainly visible to the naked eye. We trust that our cotemporary, in a subsequent issue, will correct this mistake, to which we mildly call its attention.

On the opening evening to which we refer, a goodly number of the cognoscenti, the dilettanti, and the literati of the town were present. Not only was the Gallery opened, but a number of bottles were opened as well, agreeably interspersing the excellent studies in oil with most admirable studies in wine. (For the benefit of those not posted in art matters, we will here state that a "study in oil" has nothing to do with prospecting for petroleum, being something of an entirely different color.) We have indicated that an entertainment was offered, and that substantial sandwiches and cold turkey were offered for the edification of connoisseurs as well as the painted game and fruit and flowers that hung upon the walls. So it was. And those present at these social affairs have probably noticed that when corks are drawn the lightness of those useful compressors and repressors of fluids seems to enter into the conversation and spirits, and sometimes into the heads, of the convivial guests. The present occasion proved no exception to the general rule. Notwithstanding his name, which would plainly point him out as born to be President of some Dashaway association, Captain Vandewater insisted on a general filling of glasses, and, going back on a previous declaration that no speeches were intended or would be allowed, proceeded to make the first one himself. His remarks had at least the merit of brevity, as he pinned the effort down to proposing a toast to the success of the Art Union, introducing Mr. R. C. Rogers as the arch expounder of the association and its objects, indulging his unconquerable penchant for a joke by informing the company that that gentleman, from his nautical—not naughty—experience in early youth, would probably favor them with a marine view of the subject. Mr. Rogers, after explaining with much clarity of diction the circumstances which led to the formation of the association, proceeded to read an extract from an address published with the catalogue, which probably embodied his views and represented them fully, he being the author. Subsequently other speeches were had, D. C. McRuer indulging in a little rehearsal preparatory to taking his seat in that Congress to which he is elected; S. P. Dewey lending the encouragement of his voice to the enterprise and not saying a word about Ophir. John S. Hittell, Col. Warren and others coming to the rack in response to the call of the company. Among the "others," Mr. Avery issued an extra bulletin in a very prompt and neat way; the only one, in fact, of the whole crowd that made no speech being Mr. Nisbet, who wilfully and persistently refused. The utmost cordiality and good feeling prevailed at table, the only wonder being that an exhibition of paintings should so bewilder people as to make it difficult for them to find their late keys that night and oblivious of events the next morning.

The Gallery opened with one hundred and twenty-eight pictures, these the property of artists or contributed by gentlemen who take an interest in the enterprise. Space and time both fail us to enumerate all works which deserve mention, obliging us to confine ourselves simply to those which occur to us at the present moment, reserving further particularizing for another article. Shasta and the Yo Semite valley found representation at the hands of our native artists, pictures from their easels adorning the walls on all sides; that such scenery as California furnishes will produce good painters may be accepted as a foregone conclusion, for the process is as certain as that by which notable events create historians. The best of Butman's pictures in the present collection seems a view of Mount Shasta; it exhibits more the merits of his style, and fewer of its defects than do all the others combined. Virgil Williams, besides one or two very clever pictures of native scenery, has a portrait of a lady, done in an undertone which not every artist would dare to attempt, and so well done as to excite very general admiration. Deuny furnishes local marine views which should find purchasers. Hill has some landscapes on exhibition which are much better than his portraits. Brookes seems to make game and fruit his specialty, furnishing a curlew on which one of the Trustees drew a bead, or rather his check at sight. These pictures of dead game are called "still life," so that by a parity of reasoning it would seem that live game should be called "stirring death." Perry contributes a "Grandmother's Tale," an excellent little picture, which is much admired. Shaw's portraits are the best, by any native artist, in the Gallery. Of the foreign pictures we are loth to speak, for once launched upon the theme it were almost impossible to stop. "Waste Not, Want Not" is a charming picture, painted by Amberg and owned by William Norris. The management of color is so delicate that it forms an excellent study; "A Penny too Little," by Hahn, and belonging to the same owner, is also very good. "Sheep and Donkey," by Verboeckhoven, belonging to Wm. Hooper, is excellent; the donkey looks as though he might bray if he dared but avail himself of the critic's privilege. "Autumn," by H. G. Wilde, owned by George H. Howard, is an excellent picture, notwithstanding that the colors at first glance seem too bright to one who has forgotten in this changeless climate the tints of autumn leaves at home. "The Grandmother's Pet," by Moeselagen, also owned by Mr. Howard, attracts attention from the charm of its composition as well as by the manner of its execution. A "Moonlight," by Jacobson, owned by Mr. Norris, is remarkable in effect. A view from the Shenandoah Valley, by W. L. Sontag, is admirably done, showing in wood, water and sky, the beauty that fair valley possessed before contending armies trampled it under their marching feet and reddened the ground with drops which could never be mistaken for the crimson of autumn leaves. "The Fisher Boy," by Freeman, belonging to George H. Howard, is an excellent piece of painting, the head and face being particularly well painted.

A penitent "Magdalene," said to be an original by Guido Cagnacci, owned by R. J. Vandewater, strikingly illustrates the criticism which says "we have Magdalenes who look as if they never could have sinned, and others who look as if they never could have repented." This is of the latter kind; we have the indispensable attribute of the alabaster box; that perpetual memento mori, the skull; the uplifted eye, and the loose hair—but the face is "loose" too, and not only loose but coarse, reminding one somewhat of the women one sees of mornings in the Police Courts. But the form is luxuriant and modelled in a masterly manner, while the flesh—the most difficult part perhaps of all the painter is called upon to attempt—is decidedly that of a live breathing sinner. Another excellent example of figure painting is shown in "Christ appearing to Peter on the Appian way," down as an Annihil Caracci and owned by J. N. Olney. The advanced right leg seems stepping out from the canvas, and the weight of the cross is plainly to be read in the expressive face. The gallery of R. B. Woodward contributes several pleasing pictures, but space fails us to enumerate farther; the collection forms a theme to which we shall often recur. But we cannot leave the subject without mentioning a "Cat's Head" in water colors by Wandersford, so natural that not a mouse has ventured to run across the floor since it was placed.

All this while we have neglected to state the location of the Gallery. It will be found in the second story of Jones, Wool & Sutherland's building, 312 Montgomery street; admittance to it can be gained by the payment of two bits, and nothing is charged for letting people out. Thrown open to the public on Thursday evening the attendance rivaled that of the Keans, showing, perhaps, that to the multitude art is stranger than anything that ever Kotzebue wrote. The following are the officers of the association: President, Gov. F. F. Low; Treasurer, W. C. Ralston; Secretary, L. F. Ireland. Trustees, George H. Howard, R. C. Rogers, M. Cheesman, Maj. R. W. Kirkham, U. S. Army, William Norris, R. J. Vandewater, L. Cohen, R. B. Woodward, C. T. Meader, M. H. Ball, C. Brooks, Doctor V. J. Fourgeaud, A. H. Houston. Executive Committee, Robert C. Rogers, G. H. Howard, R. J. Vandewater, William Norris, C. W. Brooks. Examining Committee, Doctor V. J. Fourgeaud, M. Cheesman, William Hooper, S. W. Shaw, Virgil Williams. The Californian Art Union may now be considered as fairly lannehed upon the flood tide of prosperity and success, and we trust that it will bear our deserving artists on to fame and fortune.

THAT PUZZLE.—We have received a number of "answers" to the mathematical puzzle published last week; certainly the solution is easy enough, but nevertheless it has puzzled a number of very clever people. Of the various communications sent in we publish the following as telling the story in fewest words. But isn't our correspondent unnecessarily severe in the remarks with which he prefaces his explanations?

"The mathematical puzzle which you mention is a nice one for juveniles. Every properly trained business man understands the principle upon which averages are calculated, and at once sees that the average price of 30 apples sold for 10 cents and 30 apples for 15 cents, is not two cents for five apples, but nearly two cents and one mill for five apples. The demonstration is simple: Place in separate piles the two lots of apples; those which are sold for 10 cents on the right hand, and those which are sold for 15 cents on the left. Now take from the right-hand pile three apples, and from the left-hand pile two apples, and repeat the operation ten times; you will find that the right-hand pile is exhausted, and that in the left there are remaining ten apples; and that for the thirty apples on the right, 10 cents have been received, and 10 cents for twenty apples from the left pile. If the sale of the ten remaining apples be continued at the same rate, five apples for 2 cents, the ten apples will produce 4 cents; making, in all 14 cents for the left-hand pile instead of 15 cents. To produce 15 cents for the pile, the last ten apples must be sold at four for 2 cents, the same as the twenty other apples of that pile, or a half-cent apiece."

The steamer Sacramento yesterday took a number of gentlemen away from our shores, who will be much missed. Mr. William R. Garrison has gone back to the land of greenbacks, yielding to the fatal fascination of a currency which can be carried in one's pockets without jingling. If he has carried the wealth away with him that he deserves to enjoy, he is a triple millionaire. His friend, of a name so uncommon that he is always delicately alluded to in print as Mr. Charles Sm—h, accompanied him; whether he has gone to find out who Bella Donna is, or to rescue some lightly-clad Andromeda chained to some Isthmus rock from the grasp of some Panama monster, we are not exactly informed, but in either errand we wish him success. Capt. George Butler has gone East to consult the original dictionary-makers as to the precise meaning of the word "avid," a word lately used in THE CALIFORNIAN, and wrongfully, as he thought, though he willingly paid ten dollars to be convinced to the contrary. The report that he has gone to see why his Uncle Ben was shelved is untrue.

IN THE WRONG BOX.—A letter directed to somebody at San José was dropped into THE CALIFORNIAN's box (placed at the foot of the stairs to receive communications and save correspondents the trouble of coming up,) one day last week. It has since been forwarded through the proper medium, but we mention the circumstance to show that intelligent messengers are occasionally met with. The mistake would have been a more natural one had this been the Evening Post office, or even that of the Daily Mail.

We inadvertently omitted, last week, to chronicle the birth of the Clipper, a sporting paper; the New Age, an Odd Fellows' journal, and Puck, an illustrated comic weekly. Puck and the Clipper are said to be edited by a gentleman connected with the News Letter, author of the pungent and sometimes rather personal little items given as the utterances of the "Town Crier." We extend a cordial welcome to the new publications, and hope the great public will do likewise.

THE Fourth Brigade Ball, given at the Pavilion in Sacramento, on Monday evening last, for the purpose of establishing a military library, was well attended. The Union says: "At about midnight a fine supper was served up in the lower story." We infer that the dancing took place down in the upper story.

AN exchange, mentioning the fact that a large number of sheep had died from scarcity of food, on the Honcut, states that one of the farmers in that locality "fed his sheep, and thus prevented them from starving." Happy thought.

H E L I U S .

GREAT sun, that with exaltant step doth tread
The measureless heavens, and trail
O'er hill and slope and vale
Thy flowing raiment, loosed in mazy fold
Of ruby-tint, and bright and burnished gold,
And amber pale,

In what far region of the Universe
Is chronicled thy birth?
When did the startled Earth,
New fashioned from dull chaos, at thy spark
Leap from the dubious confines of the dark,
In light and mirth?

Wert thou among the glories of the East?
And do the lights that pave
The sea-wastes, as they lave
The walls of thy birth-chamber quicken thee
With life? Is there thy tomb beyond the sea,
And rosy wave?

All-glorious monarch of the roving worlds!
We call thee Master! Lo!
A petty-world may grow
To opulence, and thou canst wither it
With one fierce glance, and on thy brow is writ
In flaming glow

The ripe magnificence of regal power;
Yet, if thy light first fell
From heaven, or glared from hell;
From what vague shore thou may'st lift the gloom
In all thy wanderings—what is thy doom,
We cannot tell.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 14th, 1865.

D R A M A T I C M E N T I O N .

THE Keans have held possession of the Opera House during the week, with the exception of Friday evening, when they surrendered the stage to Mr. Coppin. Crowded houses have been the rule and seats for late comers the exceptions. The engagement opened on Monday evening with The Merchant of Venice, Mrs. Kean playing "Portia" to her husband's "Shylock." Great as is our admiration for that lady's talent, we cannot forbear remarking that the character is scarcely suitable to the years and figure of Mrs. Kean, excellently well as it would have fitted Ellen Tree. The unities seem violated when a young and impassioned lover kneels at the feet of a woman old enough to be his mother, and the sense of incongruity which is born seriously mars the interest of the performance. Nor is Shylock Mr. Kean's best impersonation. On Tuesday evening, Louis the XI. was given; on Wednesday, King Lear; on Thursday, The Stranger; and this evening Richard III. fills the bills. "Louis the XI." is decidedly Mr. Kean's best character; as the peevish, suspicious, cowardly and treacherous old King, clinging to life by a thread and dreading its severance, he holds the very mirror up to nature. In all Shakspearian plays, his reading is excellent, and he seems to have a thorough conception of the characters, interpreting the meaning of the mighty master with delicacy and finish. It is to be regretted, however, that he carries himself so completely into everything that he plays, reminding one by every tone and gesture that Kean is before us and not the creation of the dramatist. Seeing him one evening in The Merchant of Venice and the next in Macbeth, the impression conveyed is that Shylock has simply stepped from the stage to lay aside his gabardine and reappear in the plaid of the ambitious Scotsman. The earnestness which he breathes into all of his impersonations is wonderful, and the studied care with which even the smallest detail is filled up should stand as a pattern to actors for all time. In common hands the Shakspearian drama is apt to drag tediously along, to the weariness of auditors; but in the present instance it progresses with a commendable life and rapidity, the time consumed between acts being so reduced that the curtain scarcely touches the stage in falling before it is rung up again and the play goes on without vexatious interruptions. Time is short for those who wish to see these eminent artists, as they leave to fill an Eastern engagement in the steamer of the 3d prox., and, delightful as California is, it is scarcely likely that they will ever return to these shores. To have not seen the Keans when so golden an opportunity offered, would cause the young men of the present day to feel in a certain degree humbled in the presence of his grandchildren. As they cannot be prevailed to stay with us, we wish that Manager Maguire, as the next best thing, would make overtures to Mr. Cathcart. We look some day to see this young actor occupying a high rank in the profession.

Last evening, according to announcement, Mr. Coppin appeared in three pieces—if levity were pardonable in these critical columns, and a joke were not liable to misconstruction, we would remark that he is large enough to admit of that subdivision—in The Hypocrite, The Happiest Day of My Life, and as "Cupid," in the burlesque of that name. Whatever difference of opinion there may be as to Mr. Coppin's rank as a comedian, (and we have that vivid memory of Burton in our mind that it provokes us to hear comparisons instituted between them turning to the advantage of the former,) there can be no doubt about his comicality in a Cupid's dress. Cupid was cleverly localized for the occasion by the author of My Assessments, who is doing considerable in a dramatic way, lately.

Mrs. Emily Jordan's benefit, on Saturday evening last, was about as well attended as it could be, as many being present as the house could hold. The beneficiary never looked better, dressed better, nor played better than she did on that occasion—possibly she was moved to a somewhat extra exertion by the desire of leaving a favorable impression with her friends. Mr. Lawlor, too, as "John Mellish," acquitted himself admirably; we predict a "hit" for him in that character at the East. Mr. Frank Mayo, we venture to say, never did so execrable a thing before as his "Capt. Prodder," and we hope never will again. To say that it was bad would be to sacrifice truth to friendship—it was abominable. He dressed the character as a common sailor, wearing a tarpaulin hat which even a fore-castle hand would be ashamed to be seen with on shore, and not satisfied with this murder of the character, gagged it still further by the introduction of an immense quid of tobacco into his mouth, which he chewed in a style that made his face resemble the "gate" of a sawmill. Capt. Prodder, according to the story, was in tolerably good circumstances, and if not a gentleman was certainly an approach to one—particular mention is made of the new and shining clothes in which he invested himself when he went to call on his "sister Eliza's child." Where Mr. Mayo got his idea of a merchant captain's dress and manners from, we are at a loss to imagine, and how he came to interpret the character in the way that he did we cannot conceive. Generally we have remarked him for his good taste in such matters, consequently this sudden bathos took us, in common with his other friends, entirely by surprise. His "Armand," in Camille, on the occasion of Madam Clare's debut, was not only fine, but under the circumstances it was wonderful, and his "Ruy Gomez" in Faint Heart never Won Fair Lady is something to be proud of. We hope he will never do anything like that Prodder part of his again.

Matilda Heron, who is under engagement to Mr. Maguire, left New York on the 3d inst., and will probably arrive here about the 29th of the month. The Keans take their departure on the 3d of February, and Miss Heron will commence her engagement as soon as sufficiently rested from the fatigues of her voyage. Then we shall have a "Camille" that will indeed be worth witnessing, for in her hands the character can well challenge criticism. We observe by the Eastern papers that Miss Heron lately produced a play of her own, The Mysteries of the Temple of Paris, in Boston. A newspaper notice says of it: "The play is one of much interest, is crammed with incidents of a dramatic nature, and the situations are very striking." "Crammed" is good. We are yet uninformed whether Miss Heron will make her first appearance in this production of her own, or in the Dumas drama, with which her name has become inseparably associated. One comes and another goes; Miss Heron's advent upon our stage will be looked for with interest, and that her engagement will prove a success seems secured in advance.

Another Sacred Concert will be given at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. The best talent of the city has been enlisted in these Sunday evening reunions; but strange to say, they do not draw as they should. We would advise the public to support sacred music better of Sunday evenings, or the chances are that Mr. Maguire will treat them to a little banjo music by way of change. For the popular taste must be gratified.

THE Hippodrome at the Mechanics' Pavilion has really got the public on the hip, drawing better now, as the merits and novelty of the performances become more generally known, than it did during its first week. Several novelties have been inaugurated of late. Monkey racing affords a deal of fun, which is greatly heightened by the serious decorum and trepidation of the monkey riders, as they go circling around on the flying horses; Jocko makes no willing jockey. A number of the best native vaqueros have been engaged to show the remarkable skill and precision with which, while riding at full speed, they throw the lasso. The afternoon performances last Saturday drew an audience of over two thousand ladies and children within the Pavilion's inclosure. Encouraged by this success, Saturday afternoon performances will be continued until further notice.

YOUNG LADIES' INSTITUTE.—Miss M. Lammond, late Principal of the well-known "Young Ladies' Seminary" at Benicia, has recently purchased the interest of Mrs. Swedenstierna in the "Institute for Young Ladies" on Silver street, near Third, and has just inaugurated the first half-yearly term with most flattering success. This Institution, under the acknowledged ability, energy, and care of the lady principal, aided by an efficient corps of assistants, promises to take front rank in the educational colleges of our state.

MORE books from Roman! In Arctic Researches and Life among the Esquimaux, by Charles Francis Hall, we have an entertaining narrative of adventure. The author spent two years and more in and about the arctic seas; hunting and fishing with the natives, and even eating raw seal-meat with them. In the course of his explorations he found traces of the Frobisher expeditions, and he has a confident hope of being able to find further particulars concerning the fate of Franklin and his men. For he tells us in his preface that by the time the book is in the reader's hands he will again be climbing about among icebergs and slipping over the snow of the polar regions. The work is profusely illustrated. Conscientiously we cannot commend the author's style, but his book abounds with that interest which always attaches to a story of little known regions told by one "who has been there."

Hymns of the Ages is a collection of the grand religious poems that echo down the aisles of years. The book is a beautiful one and the arrangement of the contents is admirable. A better present for one's mother could not be chosen.

"Orpheus C. Kerr" neglectful for the moment of the interests of the "Mackerel Brigade" has published a book of poems—The Palace Beautiful. Orpheus touches the harp gracefully, and his verses are sweet and tender in expression, but we regret that he suffered himself to be persuaded into the cheap and wretched illustrations that accompany them. A blank page would set off a poem better than such meaningless pictures as the one that smiles upon "Aspasia"—and murders while it smiles.

The Queen of the County is by the author of Margaret and her Bridesmaids; an Englishwoman, she dedicates the book to her "literary sisters in America." This from a nation that has given us little for the past three years but pirates and abuse is so courteous that our heart warms to the authoress and we consent to praise the book without reading it, recommending everyone to read it, "mortal long" though it be—400 octavo pages.

Of The old Merchants of New York, by "Walter Barrett, clerk," we have a third series. Originally the papers which compose the book appeared in the New York Leader, their publication being interrupted by the death of the author. The reader will perhaps recognize in "Walter Barrett, clerk," Joseph Scoville, otherwise "Manhattan" long a correspondent of one of the London papers and author of a novel—Marion—which was published and very generally denounced some time last year. The present book, being mainly of local interest, will scarcely find a very large sale outside of New York.

Mrs. Jameson's Legends of the Monastic Orders as represented in the Fine Arts, is a companion volume to the two beautiful little blue and gold books which found mention last week. As the title would indicate, the authoress designs to interpret those works of art which the churches and galleries of Europe and private collections have made familiar as objects of taste, while they remain unappreciated as subjects of thought. Now that we have an Art Union among us, containing undoubted originals by celebrated masters, these works of Mrs. Jameson's will doubtless find a ready sale. Roman probably had the Art Union in View when he brought them out.

We have a valuable book for the student—and indeed are not all readers students?—in The Correlation and Conservation of Forces, a series of expositions by eminent professors, with biographical notices of the chief promoters of the new views, by Edward L. Youmans, M. D.

The Patriot Boy by the Rev. P. C. Headley, furnishes the life of Gen. O. M. Mitchell, and is one of a series of lives of modern American heroes for boys and young men. The object is a good one, and this go-thou-and-do-like-wise series may have beneficial results.

THE Annual Election for officers of the Mercantile Library Association will take place on Monday next. There are two tickets in the field, the usual "Regular" and "Opposition," both of which exhibit names well known on the Bialto and Forum. We advise all parties interested to vote early, and, as there is no penalty attached to the act, to be sure and vote often. The successful candidates, whoever they may chance to be, will find their position full of honors and labors, but without even the shadow of emolument; for which reason they have, in advance, a share of that sympathy which is always bestowed on the members of our City Boards of Education and Supervisors.

Captain Franklin Haven, of Gen. McDowell's staff, has been appointed Lieutenant Colonel Second Regiment C. V., and also has been commissioned by the War Department Judge Advocate for the Pacific coast.

The Sacramento Bee has recently entered upon its ninth volume, with every appearance of enjoying the success which it merits.

AN OLD LETTER.

[As an example of "the sensational in literature," the following story, which we find in the columns of a New York Sunday paper, will suffice for all time. It matters not that the story has neither point nor moral; tears and blood abound, and, as the heroine naively remarks to her father, when all is done, "we are very wretched." We scarcely see how the story has escaped dramatization, for we seriously assure the reader that it is not a burlesque.]

ONE evening Admiral Ducachet sat on the quarter-deck of his vessel, La Victorieuse, gazing with his glass on the boat from his ship that was coming with the rapidity of twelve experienced oarsmen from Port Kingston, in Jamaica. He was waiting for letters from France from his family, from all who were dear to him, and these letters must have been lying for him some months; and as he watched the approaching boat, he pictured to himself the house from which those letters had been written.

He saw his beautiful young wife, his wife of six years, the mother of his child, his little daughter, but just born when he had left, now over four years of age. He saw them in the quiet luxurious home he had provided for them on the coast of Brittany, and he wondered what his child had grown like, and his heart yearned for one look of that wife, one kiss from her lips, one low whisper that should say, "Husband, I love you." Now the boats near the shore, the boatswain jumps on deck, the mail-bag in his hand, and with the usual ceremonial, the Admiral has received his European mail. He opens it. There are letters from his lawyers, letters from his friends, letters from the government, but from his wife none. She has not written, but here is a bulky packet from his lawyer, his friend, the man to whom he has confided his interests. How foolish! Of course her letter is within his. He opens it; he recognizes his wife's hand-writing, and breaks the seal. The men who chanced to be looking at their commander, saw him pass his hand over his eyes and turn away; then the Admiral folded his letters, gathered them up, and descended to his state-room. There, sitting before the table, his face buried in his hands, they would have seen their commander weep like any woman, sobbing with sobs that seemed to rend his breast. She had written, yes, his Henrietta had written; but from her death-bed; written to him a last adieu, bequeathed to him with the last words of a dying mother, her child, her only beloved child—the only trace of their union on earth—her little Estelle.

A few hours later the Admiral had found the courage to read his other letters. There he had all the details of her death; there she had told him that Estelle, his child, was safe with him, and that like the last moments of a saint had been the last moments of his wife.

For many days the Admiral was quiet and reserved, then at last he recovered himself, and, to all appearances, his usual manner. Never did he confide to any one his sorrow, but sailed on the far-distant cruise to which he had received government orders, an able and a popular commander as he had always been. Admiral Ducachet continued in active service at his own request for over ten years. At last he returns to France, at last he is on the road to Bordeaux, and the gray bronzed soldier pauses at the threshold of his home.

"Henriette," he murmurs, "Henriette, my own, my beloved, that I should return and find you not; but our child!"

In another moment the Admiral holds in his arms all that is left of the wife of his youth and love, his Henriette—Estelle; all that he had to link him with human affections—all that could call him to earth from that grand mistress over whom he held command—the ocean.

He pressed his child to his heart; then putting her from him he gazed on her, and as those deep blue eyes, misty with tears, gazed on him from beneath their dark lashes, his heart beat at the remembrance of the day when first she, who was dead and gone, had said to him, "I love you." Scarcely could he refrain from falling at her feet. His child—his child; a creature all his own—a heart pure from all love but his. If idolatry were ever felt for one human being to another, this father felt it for his daughter; and if it were a sin in the eyes of heaven, the Admiral was guilty of that sin, and of the penalty it entailed.

Admiral Ducachet was rich; his wife had been rich; he established his daughter in a chateau near Bordeaux, with every luxury. Her first slave was her father; she reigned supreme; her very whims assumed to him the aspect of imperial decrees, and the Admiral was happier trotting on his horse to Bordeaux to gratify some whim of Estelle's than he had ever been in boarding an enemy, and when he laid at her feet the object she had desired, he was prouder than when he had laid at the foot of the throne the flags taken at the risk of his life's blood in battle.

When Estelle reached her seventeenth year, Monsieur Folgar, his lawyer, and the friend who had closed Henriette's eyes, almost gave the Admiral a fit of apoplexy by insinuating to him that it was necessary Estelle should be married.

Part with his daughter! Have another share her love? It was impossible. He would speak to his daughter. After all she might not desire to marry. She might love him so much that that love would satisfy her.

"Stella," said he one day, "Stella, my own love, you know that men are sailors and soldiers, and God help them, lawyers and physicians; but that women have but one career in life, that is to get married. Now, Estelle, Folgar says you are to get married—at least that you ought, and that you desire to. Is it so?"

"I don't know," replied Mademoiselle Estelle, tossing her head on high, "I really don't know. It depends on who the husband is."

"Well, if there must be a husband, he shall be of the very best kind we can get him—young, handsome, agreeable, good tempered—" "And a sailor?"

"A sailor!" exclaimed the admiral, "Really a sailor!"

"Why, do you think your daughter would marry any one but a sailor?"

Admiral Ducachet clasped his child to his bosom. Then he had but one regret in the world, that was that Estelle had not been a boy; for then she would have been a sailor, and to him a sailor was something more than a man. His emotion over, the admiral looked at Estelle. She seemed almost as much affected as himself.

"Why, child, are you sorry not to have been able to be a sailor?"

"No," replied Estelle, laughing, "but I know you would have preferred my being a boy; but as that cannot now be changed, why all I can do is to give you a sailor for a son."

"We will find him," exclaimed the admiral; "we will take the best and handsomest officer in the navy."

"Do not trouble yourself," said Estelle, "I think I have found him."

"Found him! Who is he?—what is his rank?—what is the name of the ship?"

"Never mind, father, I know."

"But had I not better know, also?"

"It is not at all necessary. When the time comes you shall know all."

"Then you know all about him?" "Certainly."

"Upon my word, I thought young ladies—"

"There are exceptional cases, admiral," said Estelle, "and I am one. I chose to choose my own husband."

"So you shall, my child! And he must be all right just because he is a sailor."

"And you will wait," said Estelle.

"Patiently," said the admiral.

That night, when the admiral retired to his room, he took from an old chest a small case covered with leather, looking old and worn, but having in letters still bright on its lid the name of Henriette.

The admiral gazed at it for some minutes with emotion. It was his wife's jewel-case. He remembered the day he had given it her. He remembered how often he had seen her open it to put in some present of his; and her young, cheerful voice thanking him with playful words, seemed to float around him.

He had never opened it since his return; but now his child must have her mother's diamonds; he knew these were a necessary appendage to all weddings, and the admiral, averse as he had been, was now eager for the marriage.

"Of course they must be reset," said he; "let us see."

He opened the lid and looked in it. Over the smaller red and green cases of the various sets he saw packages of old letters neatly tied together. The poor admiral smiled, and a tear fell on the old yellow paper.

"Poor Henriette! she treasured every line I wrote."

Then the admiral mechanically took a letter from the package he held in his hand, and opened it. The next moment, with a stifled cry, he fell into the nearest seat, pale, and his powerful frame tremblingly, utterly helpless.

The next morning Estelle waited in vain for her father; the breakfast signal had been twice given, but the Admiral had not appeared. She went beneath his window and gave him the boatswain's whistle he had taught her and he loved to hear. No reply came. Half in anger, half in alarm, she hurried up the stairs, she knocked at the door, and presently she heard his heavy step across the room.

"Ah! he is well," said she, and as the door opened she rushed forward to throw herself into her father's arms, but he roughly pushed her away.

"I shall not come to breakfast," said he, "I desire not to be disturbed—leave me."

Estelle gazed at her father with wonder. What had happened; had he suddenly lost his senses; was he ill?"

"Father," said she, "are you well?"

"Quite well, and desire to be troubled with no needless questions." Estelle turned away, and rushing to her room burst into a passion of tears.

From that day all was changed; the Admiral avoided Estelle as much as he could, and when he was near her treated her with coldness, almost with hatred, refusing her caresses, and bidding her, if with sorrowful tenderness she sought to win him back, to leave him alone.

Deep was the agony the young girl endured, for she loved her father devotedly; her only parent, the being she had been taught to reverence during all the long years of her childhood.

At length there seemed to come a change; but Estelle trembled as she thought what now it might lead to. The officer to whom she had alluded when her father had proposed that she should marry was now in Bordeaux. He had been the companion of her life, a ward, also, of M. Folgar's, her guardian, and their love had grown with them. Pledged to each other in heart if not in word were they, and Estelle had often thought with delight on the congenial companion she would give her father in his son-in-law—her sailor lover. Now, how should she announce his arrival? But M. Folgar, her father's friend, solved this difficulty.

"Estelle," said he, one day, "Reymon is coming to-day to see your father." "The Admiral?"

"Yes; I see by your expression that he has not changed his manner towards you."

"No; and I am miserable."

"Perhaps your marriage may make some change, for the Admiral wishes this marriage to take place as soon as possible."

"Ah!" exclaimed Estelle, bursting into tears, "he wants to get rid of me, to send me from him."

Monsieur Folgar turned away. That morning the Admiral had said to him:

"I must get this girl out of my house: the sight of her revives each hour my anger and my indignation; she has no right here—" "Ah! Admiral."

"Folgar, you have read those letters; he loved her mother even when I married her; he loved her afterwards within a few days of her death; the last letter dated—I was deceived by both. Estelle is not my child."

"There is no proof."

"None, but I feel, and her letters would condemn her in all but a court of law; now, let the girl go away from me; let me never see her again."

That day the Admiral sat in his study, when the servant announced Lieutenant Reymon.

Cold were the first salutations. He was to be Estelle's husband; the Admiral already hated him as belonging to her.

"You love my daughter?" "With my whole soul." "You ask her hand in marriage?" "I do."

"She will have her mother's dowry as hers, two hundred thousand francs; from me she has nothing to expect."

"I ask nothing; I am rich, and have even a title, but dropped it when I entered the service, as a vain distinction. My father was the Marquis de Bressieres."

"Then," exclaimed the Admiral starting up, "he was a villain and a traitor!" "Sir! What do you mean?"

"I speak distinctly to you; he was a villain and a traitor, and if his son has any blood in his veins he will avenge the insult I thus put upon his memory. Ah! young man, you do not know how I have yearned to find some one living on whom to avenge my wrongs, for I have cursed him in his grave for dying and robbing me of my revenge."

"You shall not wait for it long," said the young lieutenant; "you shall hear from me to-day."

"Ah!" exclaimed the Admiral, as he was gone; "a double revenge is this, for Estelle, his child, too, will be as wretched as I am; poor Estelle! but no, I will show no signs of weakness."

The next morning the Admiral, leaving his home at day-break, repaired to a small wood about a mile distant. There already his second, with Reymon and his friend, awaited him.

Silently and quickly were the preliminaries accomplished, and in a few moments the wood echoed forth the sound of firearms. Both fired, but only one fell; it was Reymon.

The Admiral, with the generous instincts of his nature, bent over his victim. It needed no surgeon to tell him that the wound was mortal.

"Admiral," said the young man, "my father is avenged."

I know not his offence, but he gave me this letter to give to you on the day of my marriage with your daughter."

"With my daughter?"

"Yes; he had watched us as children, and seen the dawning of our love; on his death-bed he bade me ask to obtain Estelle's hand; bade me have no other wife. Now that is over; Admiral, give me your hand."

The Admiral knelt beside him. Oh, Heaven! de Bressieres had desired this alliance then; Estelle was his own, his true legitimate child, the child of his blood. Bitter tears fell on the dying face, growing pale and gray beneath his eyes, and soon within his arms lay a clay-cold corpse.

On the blood-red turf after they had borne the body away, did the Admiral read that letter—a message from the grave.

They were innocent; his young wife—her love had been deep, but it had been pure; both had struggled, and both had conquered and died faithful to their marriage vows.

Estelle was his child, but now what had he done? He hurried to his home; the tidings had already reached Estelle. He knelt before; he held out his hands towards her; he dared not clasp her to his heart. But Estelle fell on his bosom.

"Father," said she, amid the deep sobs, "we are very wretched."

Once again Admiral Ducachet is on the ocean, far away in the Polar seas, never again to return to France. All he loves sleeps under a white marble stone in the garden of the dead at Nice.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REDUCTION AND AMALGAMATION OF Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, in a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs. in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The millers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The millers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the millers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the millers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the millers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one not acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or millers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,
ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS.

NEWS "over the wires" comes slowly and is without especial interest, owing to the chronic indefiniteness which of late prevails among telegraph newsmen. The blood-current, however, has ceased its flow, the sacrifices to the war-god have been fewer, and there are even hopes that the dawn of peace is about to break upon us, after the long dark night. Rumors follow each other in quick succession: Peace Commissioners are appointed by the rebels; a prominent Peace Democrat has gone to Richmond, with the approval of the President; Montgomery Blair is also in the rebel capital. Neither of the latter appear to act in an official capacity. It will be a happy day for the nation when peace comes again.

January 7.—Taylor the rebel guerilla, has commenced a raid into Kentucky. He occupied Owensburg, Haysville, Cloverport and Anderson, and conscripted several of the citizens. The steamers leaving Owensburg for New Albany were fired into. They stopped the trains, robbed the passengers and burned the cars.

The expedition under Grierson which was sent out by Dana on the 21st ult., has been successful. The Mobile and Ohio Railroad had been struck five miles below Corinth and utterly destroyed to below Okolona. 29 bridges, a great deal of trestle work, 32 cars, 300 army wagons and 4,000 carbines were destroyed. Gen. Grierson had orders to destroy the road as far as Meridian, and, if possible, release our prisoners at Casamaba. Among prisoners captured are one Colonel, one Lieut.-Colonel, twenty-five line officers, and a number of our men who, to escape the horrible treatment as Federal prisoners at Andersonville, had joined the rebel army.

January 8.—Sherman, having crossed the river in safety, is reported to be moving on Grahamsville.

Gen. Thomas has been made a Major General in the regular army, vice Fremont resigned, dating from his victory over Hood. Similar nominations for Meade and Sheridan have been sent to the Senate.

There is nothing new to report on the lines in front of Petersburg.

The Herald's Newbern letter gives additional particulars of the Roanoke River expedition. The gunboats Otsego and Birch were sunk by torpedoes. The river was found full of them, and seventy-five were taken up in a distance of twenty-five miles. Sometimes eight or nine were found stretched across the river in a single line.

The Commercial's Washington special despatch says that Horace Greeley is there, urgent and persistent in his demand for peace, predicating a speedy termination of the war.

Rumors are prevalent that Sherman has communicated to the President that the Georgian State authorities have applied to come back into the Union, and that Secretary Stanton's visit to Savannah is doubtless in connection with this subject.

January 9.—Hood is reported to have taken across the Tennessee river from 25,000 to 28,000 men. Forrest abandoned 150 wagons on the north side last Friday. Lyon, with 800 men, passed through McMinnville, capturing a company of Tennessee cavalry.

Strenuous efforts are still being made by North Carolina to secure an "honorable peace." Resolutions have been introduced opposing the suspension of the habeas corpus, imprisonment and conscription, the surrender of State officers, and in support of the State negotiations for peace. A majority of the Committee on the resolutions to initiate negotiations for an honorable peace, report that while every effort is being made to strengthen our armies, they should be accompanied by some manifestation of an effort to secure an honorable peace.

The Times' correspondent says the investigation of the fiasco in the mine explosion in front of Petersburg has closed and the verdict will show a divided responsibility, falling upon Burnside, Meade, and the general who led the assault; nor does General Grant hold himself entirely blameless, especially in permitting the selection of the officer who led the assault to be made by lot.

A Union officer, writing from the rebel prison at Columbia, S. C., says that many officers are escaping, fifteen getting away in one day. The rations to the prisoners consist of corn-meal and sorghum molasses.

Gen. Butler has been removed by the President from the position of Commander of the Army of the James and the Department of Virginia and North Carolina, and ordered to report at Lowell, Mass. Gen. Ord was placed temporarily in the important position.

The elder Blair has gone on a peace mission to Richmond. He is not officially authorized. The Richmond papers speak of his objects contemptuously.

Rumors from Richmond give us the information that the rebel capital is being mined, preparatory to an evacuation and a final blowing up.

Fort Smith, Arkansas, advices to the 27th of December, state that Lieut. Wilcox, of the Chickasaw battalion, had an interview with Gen. Thayer on the 6th, under a flag of truce.

The reported object of the visit was to negotiate terms of the surrender of his battalion to the Union forces. The remnant of Price's army were at Bozzy depot, Red River.

January 10.—Richmond papers of Monday contain a telegram from Charleston stating that a portion of Sherman's forces have occupied Grahamsville, S. C., 35 miles north of Savannah.

Gen. Thomas moved up the Tennessee on the 4th, with 6 gunboats and 60 transports, towards Eastport. The remnant of Hood's army is reported as going into winter quarters at Corinth.

Jan. 11.—Gen. Singleton of Illinois, according to the correspondent of the World, is on his way to Richmond on a peace mission, with the approval of President Lincoln. It is stated that Singleton has received instructions which contain three vital propositions, 1st. An amnesty to all; 2d. "The Constitution as it is and the Union as it was;" and, 3d. The abolition of slavery.

Rebel Peace Commissioners were also appointed in a secret session of the rebel Congress, consisting of Vice President Stephens, Judge White of Georgia, Messrs. Boyce and Orr, of South Carolina, Rives of Virginia, and Smith and Singleton of Mississippi.

January 12.—Deserters from the rebel army state that Lee's forces have gone into winter quarters at Hickford, on the Weldon railroad.

The steamer C. C. Collins, from Port Royal the 7th, reports that part of Sherman's army had arrived at Beaufort by water.

From Richmond papers we gather the following: The Richmond Sentinel of the 6th says that Sherman is doubtless moving on Branchville, S. C.

The Examiner says despatches from Hardee reports the enemy before Hardeeville, but with no indications of an immediate attack.

The Chronicle comments on affairs in Savannah by warning Georgians against submission, and says it is treasonable.

Governor Magrath of South Carolina has issued a proclamation calling on all free white men between the ages of sixteen and sixty, to come to the defence of Charleston, willing if they will, but forcibly if necessary.

The Richmond Examiner suggests the hanging of certain merchants of Wilmington, who refused to take Confederate money while our (Federal) fleet was before that city.

The Richmond Enquirer reports a skirmish on the Spring Place road near Dalton, Georgia, in which the rebels captured seventy prisoners, seventeen horses and forty or fifty stand of arms. No date is given.

The Mobile Register reports that a steamer, powerfully armed, has just been completed at that city, and has taken her place in the harbor.

The Mobile Tribune learns that on the 10th a party of Yankee raiders, numbering thirteen hundred, reached West Pascagoula, and were embarked on launches. They destroyed several ferries, but did no other damage.

The pirate Semmes met with an enthusiastic reception at Mobile.

LOCAL ITEMS.

The Camanche will make her trial trip on the bay during the coming week.

The body of a man was washed ashore, Wednesday, five miles from the Cliff House. It could not be identified.

The Court of Inquiry in the case of Capt. Thomas C. Sullivan, charged with corrupt dealings in office, entirely acquits the accused. Gen. McDowell has approved the finding.

Frank Hartley, a resident of Third street, near Mission, fell while passing up Clay street, opposite the Plaza, Jan. 11th, causing a fracture of the collar-bone.

The city authorities have renewed the offer of $200 reward for the arrest of incendiaries; $1,000 is offered by the Insurance Companies. There ought to be money in the business at such prices, for there is no lack of materials to work on.

Leon Prudon, one of the founders of Lafayette Hook and Ladder Company, No. 2, died from the breaking of an internal abscess, on Sunday last. His funeral was attended by nearly the entire department.

The bounties due the Seventh Regiment are being paid at the Presidio. An order for the payment of Quartermaster's checks in this Department to the amount of $1,000,000 is expected soon.

The Californian Art Union (second story of Jones, Woolf & Sutherland's building, 312 Montgomery street) was opened to invited guests, Wednesday evening, and to the public on Thursday. As the "big editor" was invited, "Items" (who learns that interesting fact precisely at this juncture,) refers the reader to the eighth page for details.

A sure-enough pirate has been captured in our waters at last. At different times during the past year quantities of wood have disappeared from landings on the bay; on Sunday night last a piratical craft was discovered lying at the wharf at Refugio, loading with wood. On being discovered, she hoisted sail to escape, but was soon overtaken, and found to be without name or papers. A man named Muir was on board, as captain and crew, who stated that the vessel was the Marguerite, of Oakland; the wood had, meanwhile, been thrown overboard, and the skipper averred that his craft was not the one seen at the landing—he was "not himself at all," and didn't want to be. Muir is under arrest—his schooner nearly under water, leaking badly. No naval promotions are expected, as the credit of the capture is due Citizen Fernandez, of Pinola Landing, the owner of the floating wood.

John Hill, an English cook, about forty years of age, was found dead in his bed at the St. Lawrence House, Wednesday night. He had probably died suddenly from heart disease.

Company B, Native California Battalion, Capt. Le Gros, passed through the city Thursday, having been ordered to San Juan. With their fine horses, glistening lances, and fierce moustaches, they looked the "conquer-or-perish" soldiery to perfection, and will doubtless give a good account of themselves whenever their fighting qualities are tested.

The Market Street Railroad is being extended along the line of Valencia to John street.

Dr. George F. Woodward has been elected Physician to the Fire Department, vice Henry M. Gray, deceased.

INTERIOR ITEMS.

The San Andreas Register says there are as many miners profitably employed in that section of the State as at any time since 1849.

A child of J. B. Wilson fell into the Mokelumne river, a few days ago, and was drowned.

Thomas Hankey, a miner, was shot fatally at the Mount Oro claim in Morris Ravine, Cal., recently. Carr, a former partner of deceased, charged with the murder, has been arrested and held to answer.

Superintendent Wiley denies the statement of Philanthropist Beeson that the Indians in this State are without food, and that Indian affairs generally are mismanaged.

Many of the thieves who have been very industrious in Napa county lately have been arrested.

Fine specimens of cinnabar have been taken from the vicinity of the American mine, says the Santa Rosa Democrat, and claims are rapidly being located.

Frank Dusy, of Snellings, says the Mariposa Gazette, has discovered and located a petroleum spring on the eastern slope of the Coast Range, forty miles from Firebaugh's Ferry. As the oil is said to be good and the source abundant, it is gratifying to be able to give the locality with such particularity.

Edward Hadsell killed his father-in-law, C. N. Winkson, at Drytown, Cal., Jan. 9th. He had been refused permission to see his children, who with their mother resided with Winkson. Hadsell was arrested; while in custody, a brother-in-law, fired four shots at him without effect.

In the case of Bawland vs. Morley, the Supreme Court on the 6th inst. reversed the decision of Judge Bondurant, of Mariposa, and again affirmed the validity of the Specific Contract Act.

Seventy cans of petroleum in a crude state were shipped to San Francisco from an oil well lately discovered near Buena Vista Lake, Tulare county.

Four Chinamen lately robbed several stores near West Point and Sandy Gulch, Calaveras county. They took eighty pairs of boots from one store.

Mr. Carrigan, while at work in a tunnel (300 feet below the surface) leading from the shaft of the Oneida mine, Amador county, on the 6th inst., was killed by a caving in of the tunnel.

B. B. Redding, of Sacramento, has been appointed by the Governor a Trustee of the State Library in place of Dr. J. F. Morse, resigned.

The U. S. steamer Wateree is expected at Sacramento today, (14th.) Her draught is nine feet.

John W. Quick was severely injured by the caving in of his mining claim at Bolt's Hill, recently. His partner sluiced him out, and found that his collar-bone and shoulder-blade were broken; he had also received internal injuries.

A marble ledge of great value has discovered recently near Columbia, Cal. The marble is beautifully traced by black, green and pink veins; it readily takes a fine polish.

On the 7th inst. a band of Indians robbed the mail and express three miles east of Julesburg, Colorado Territory, and also attacked a party in charge of a mule train, killing one man and wounding another. Troops started at once in pursuit, and drove the red-skins some distance, when the latter were reinforced and the soldiers retreated. The Indians then destroyed the furniture and telegraphic materials and set fire to the buildings at the stage station, when the troops, in company with a citizen volunteer force, made a successful charge upon the savages. In the running fight which ensued, 35 Indians (including their Chief) and 19 soldiers and citizens were killed.

In the Sacramento District Court La Forest Wilson has been found guilty of manslaughter.

Wiley Fulghur was drowned near Collinsville, Cal., recently, by the capsizing of a boat.

The Florence Sewing Machine

—AND—

Work done on the FLORENCE have taken all the First Premiums awarded to Sewing Machines and Machine work at the Fairs of California in 1864.

Read the report of the Committee on Sewing Machines at the great Industrial Exhibition of the Mechanics' Institute:

THE FLORENCE.—We have given this new Sewing Machine a careful and minute examination. Its simple and finished mechanical construction, and the obvious adaptability of each part to its work, has been to us an interesting study. It differs essentially from other Sewing Machines, having many new and peculiar features. It makes four kinds of stitch, each alike on both sides of the fabric, has a reversible feed motion, and sews any thickness of goods without change of tension. We consider the "FLORENCE" a decided improvement in sewing mechanism.

COMMITTEE.

S. O. BRIGHAM, Pioneer Sewing Machine Agent on the Pacific Coast, and five years San Francisco agent for the Grover & Baker Machine.

AN UNMITIGATED HUMBUG!

The Agent of a certain Sewing Machine evidently intends, by humbug and deception, to foist his wares upon the public, instead of endeavoring by the merit of the article (if it possesses any) to attain an honorable position among those so well and favorably known. He advertises thus:

"The FLORENCE Machine, and work done on the FLORENCE, have taken ALL THE FIRST PREMIUMS awarded to Sewing Machines and Machine Work at the Fairs of California in 1864."

That the ambiguity of the insinuation contained above may deceive no one, we would say that ALL the Fairs in California in 1864, at which ANY premium has been awarded, is ONE—the Mechanics', just closed, whose official Report reads thus:

'Sewing Machines.—Premium to the Florence, no competition.'

This is the OVERWHELMING success which has attended the FLORENCE Machine at "ALL the Fairs in California in 1864."

And again the Report reads thus:

"Machine Sewing.—Premium to Mrs. Nancy Barton."

As the FLORENCE Machine claims the first premium on Machine Work, and we do not "see it in that light," we publish the following from Mrs. Barton:

SAN FRANCISCO, October 7th, 1864.

The Machine Sewing for which I received the First Premium at the Mechanics' Institute Fair was executed on the GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINE, which style I have had in constant use for five or six years, and consider superior to all others.

MRS. NANCY BARTON.

So the FLORENCE Machine, with NO COMPETITION, did obtain a Premium on the Machine, and DID NOT obtain ANY Premium on Machine Work as claimed. Even the "Card" published as a COMMITTEE REPORT loses in a slight degree its importance, as follows:

Extract from the signatures on "Committee Report," published by the FLORENCE Agent.

"O. C. WHEELER, who has been on more SEWING MACHINE Committees than any other person in California."

THE SEWING MACHINE WAR.

Mr. Wheeler writes thus:

* * * A gentleman called at my office at a time when I was exceedingly busy, and asked me to append my name to a report which he held in his hand on Sewing Machines, then exhibiting at the "Industrial Fair of the Mechanics' Institute" in this city. I said, "I have no knowledge of being on a Committee, and have made no examination."

He informed me that as the FLORENCE was the only Machine on exhibition, and had no competition, an examination was unnecessary. I then wrote my name and he left.

I WOULD NOT have served on a Committee or signed any report had there been any competition, for the reason that my family have used the GROVER & BAKER Machine for several years, and would be unwilling to change it for any other.

I do not remember having ever served on a Committee or signed a report on Sewing Machines before. The statement that I have "served on more Sewing Machine Committees than any other person in California" is therefore untrue and wholly unauthorized. O. C. WHEELER.

San Francisco, October 7th, 1864.

Thus the advertisement of the FLORENCE agent from first to last, is a humbug, and nothing else.

The only Fair on the Pacific Coast where the FLORENCE Machine has been exhibited in competition for a Premium against others was at the Oregon State Fair, in September, where it was essentially defeated, and two First Premiums awarded GROVER & BAKER for best Sewing Machine and Machine Sewing.

(October 19.)

REPLY TO

THE UNMITIGATED HUMBUG!

CARD OF R. G. BROWN.

A new Sewing Machine, recently introduced on this Coast, having taken all the honors awarded to Sewing Machines and Sewing Machine Work by the Fairs of California in 1864, an agent for one of the old established Machines, evidently worried, endeavors by ridicule and the charge of humbug to hide from the eyes of the public the magnitude of the victories achieved by this new comer.

The FLORENCE and the Work done on the FLORENCE, have taken five First Premiums instead of one, as would be inferred from the statement of the agent of the Grover & Baker Machine, and no greater triumph could be desired for the FLORENCE than the fact that it had "no competition" at a Fair like the Grand Industrial Exhibition of the Mechanics' Institute just closed, held, too, in San Francisco, where nearly every description of Sewing Machine in the known world is represented.

If Mrs. Nancy Barton intends in her note to claim the Premium on Machine Sewing at the late Mechanics' Fair, she has made a great mistake, as the Premium was awarded to work done on the FLORENCE.

The "Sun Bonnet" on which she took a Premium was classed with Fancy Needlework, and was not examined by the Committee on Sewing Machine Work.

From Mr. O. C. Wheeler's statement some have incorrectly inferred that his signature was obtained by some party interested in or connected with the FLORENCE. The Committee were chosen in the usual manner, and we supposed Mr. Wheeler, as one of them, did his duty properly. If his time would not admit of this, it would have been more satisfactory to all concerned had he declined to serve.

From the above, which we are prepared to substantiate to the letter, it will be seen that the FLORENCE advertisement, which the Grover & Baker agent calls an unmitigated humbug was true in every particular, excepting the statement that Mr. Wheeler had been on other Sewing Machine Committees. His connection with the State Fairs as Secretary making it necessary for him to have much to do with Sewing Machines and Sewing Machine Committee reports, led to this very natural mistake; while the notice of the Grover & Baker agent, to which he gives so appropriate a heading, contains many misstatements and ambiguously worded "Curds" that are liable to be misconstrued.

SAMUEL HILL,
General Agent Florence Sewing Machines,
111 Montgomery Street, S. F.

(October 22.)

THOSE

SEWING MACHINE PREMIUMS

AGAIN!

The "Reply" of the Agent of the FLORENCE Machine is fluent with such aspiring words as "Triumphs," "Victories," "Honors," and the like, which, as applied to any events in the history of that Machine, are simply ridiculous.

The "magnitude" of the "victories" attained by the FLORENCE is apparent to none but himself. Show them up, Mr. Hill; give the public an opportunity of realizing the vastness of "all the honors" conferred in so lavish a manner.

Show them if you can, and name any premium your Machine has ever received at any Fair over any first, second, or third-class machine in existence!

Perhaps it was an "honor" to exhibit against the GROVER & BAKER Machine at the Oregon State Fair, just closed, where Two First Premiums were awarded the GROVER & BAKER over the FLORENCE. Will Mr. Hill name any first premium his Machine has ever received for Sewing Machine work in competition with others?

THE SEWING MACHINE WAR.

The unequivocal "triumph" of the Florence Machine at the Mechanics' Institute Fair, and its single specimen of sewing at the Stockton Fair—without competition in either case—is certainly tremendous. "A contented mind is a continual feast." As you say you desire no greater triumph for the Florence than the fact that it had no competition at the Mechanics' Fair, allow us to congratulate you on so readily attaining your desires. All the honors of this bloodless "Victory" undoubtedly are yours, and, as we do not deny it, we trust your laurels may rest easily on your triumphant brow.

Your complete satisfaction in such a result, where there was no competition, and by the rules of the Society the Exhibitors were allowed to select their own Committees, will be more fully appreciated by a sympathizing public in consideration of the immense risk and great danger in which you stood of being defeated (?) by your selected Committee of interested friends and owners of the Florence Machine. Advertise your single-handed "Victories," proclaim your undivided "Honors"—make much of your one-sided "Triumphs," unquelled in their overwhelming (?) "magnitude," but until you can strengthen them by a conquest over some third, second, or first-class Machine, they will be but as sound and fury—signifying nothing.

The Grover & Baker is the only First Premium Sewing Machine, having received every First Premium awarded any Sewing Machines when in competition, in 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864.

R. G. BROWN, Agent,
329 Montgomery street.

THE SEWING MACHINE WAR.

he First Premium on Sewing Machines and Sewing Machine Work at the Oregon State Fair, held in Salem, September, 1864, and being one of the Committee on Sewing Machines and Sewing Machine Work at said Fair, I feel it my duty to make, and take pleasure in making the following statement:

Three (if not all) of the Committee were selected by a Mr. Johnson, (an employe of the Grover & Baker Company,) and after a careful examination of the Sewing Machines and Machine Work on exhibition, and a long consultation, it was finally decided and agreed by the Committee, to award the First Premium to the FLORENCE Machine as the best Machine for doing all grades of work, and a Premium to the Grover & Baker Machine for embroidery; and the Committee reported such decision to the President of the Fair, Judge Thornton, who wrote out the report and read it to the Committee, as above stated, four of whom signed it without reading it, the other member of the Committee having been called away. The above is a true statement of the views of the Committee and their final decision.

MARY A. HOWE.

STATE OF OREGON,
County of Multnomah, ss.

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned, a Notary Public in and for said County and State, Mary A. Howe, who, being first duly sworn, says the above statement is true, as she verily believes.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my notarial seal, this 4th day of November, 1864.
(Notarial Seal.) J. N. DOLPH,
Notary Public, Multnomah County, Oregon.

STATE OF OREGON,
County of Linn, ss.

I have read the above statement, (I being one of the Committee mentioned,) and the same is true to the best of my knowledge and belief.

EMILY C. GRIFFIN.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 13th day of December, 1864.

JAMES ELKINS,
County Clerk, Linn County, Oregon.

I was one of the five ladies comprising the Committee for the examination of Sewing Machines at the late Oregon State Fair, and am the party referred to above as having been called away before signing our Report. I hereby say that the above statements are true as to the decision of the Committee.

MARY MILLER.

SEPTEMBER 29th, 1864.

We, the undersigned, a Committee appointed at the Fourth Annual Fair of the Oregon State Agricultural Society to examine and report upon the merits of different Sewing Machines on exhibition, have endeavored to perform the duty with care and impartiality. In view of all the facts, we have decided to award the First Premium to the Grover & Baker Machine, and the Second to the Florence. The principal fact influencing our decision in awarding the First Premium to the former, was the circumstance that it embroidered, while the other does not. We have, however, no hesitancy in saying that both have great merits, and we recommend them both to the patronage of the Oregon public.

THREE PICTURES.

There is a form of girlish mould,
Under the spread of the branches old,
At the well-known beechen tree,
With the sunset lighting her tresses of gold,
And the breezes waving them fold upon fold,
Waiting for me.

There is the sweet voice with cadence deep,
Of one that singeth our babe asleep,
And often turns to see
How the stars through the lattice begin to peep,
And watches the lazy dial creep,
Waiting for me.

Long since those locks are laid in the clay,
Long since that voice has passed away,
On earth no more to be;
But still in the spirit world afar,
She is the dearest of those that are Waiting for me.

JOURNALISM IN ENGLAND.

THE London Times is, of course, the first power among the journals of England. It is owned by a person named Walter; its leading editor at present is a Mr. Delaine, whose connection with the "Thunderer" extends over many years. Mr. Dament is also an editor. Its literary editor is Samuel Lucas, who is also the editor of Once a Week. Mr. Davidson is the Times' dramatic critic. Many of the Times' leaders are written by Palmerstonian members of Parliament. The paper pays splendid prices, and has the best talent upon its columns. Gladstone, the first statesman in England, frequently contributes leading articles. The circulation of the Times is about 40,000 copies. The Daily Telegraph, with a circulation of 120,000 daily, leads every newspaper in the world. It sells for one penny; the Times for three pence. Advertisements in the Times cost from three shillings to three shillings sixpence a line. The longer the advertisement the more expensive per line. The Times will not spoil its typographical appearance by inserting long advertisements except at a prodigious remuneration. The Times establishment does not mail copies to subscribers. Smith & Son, the great news agents of the United Kingdom, buy the papers and receive subscribers; they take upwards of 20,000 papers daily. Sometimes the paper comes out with double supplements—twenty-four pages in all; but an opinion exists here that the Mogul of journals must soon reduce its price or die a slow death. Three pence is six cents, and the Times costs thirty-six cents a week, or nearly nineteen dollars a year; whereas, the Star, the Standard, etc., cost but sixpence per week, and are more sprightly. The Times publishes a bedquilt, or something as thick and heavy, thrice a week, called the Evening Mail, and this sells for six pence. The Telegraph is owned by Mr. Levy, a Hebrew of Fleet street. It is in the Liberal interest, like the Times, and is equally inimical to the Federal cause. The leading Tory papers are the Herald and Standard, owned by the same firm. The former has a circulation of 4,000 copies or less, and sells for four pence; the latter has 30,000, and sells for a penny. The Morning Star, (called John Bright's paper,) is the leading Radical and pro-Federal organ. It has stood with America through disaster and victory. It has sold largely in Manchester and Birmingham, and has a circulation, (morning and evening,) of 20,000 copies. The Daily News is sadly off, with a circulation of perhaps 5,000. It sells for three pence. The Post is the Ministerial organ, and the favorite club-house paper. Its policy is always that of the Government, and the Times takes its tone from the Post. It sells for four pence, and is edited by a Mr. Boothrick. The Morning Advertiser, supported by publicans, (i. e., the London Liquor League,) has a large circulation, perhaps 20,000. The Globe is a five penny paper, of no consequence, though the Times befriends it and copies its leaders. There are some suburban papers of fair circulation, of which you never hear in America, as the Clerkenwell News, of North London, which sells for a half-penny, and has a circulation of 18,000 copies.

The first of the news-weeklies is Lloyd's Penny Paper, circulating half a million, and issuing three editions, on Friday, Saturday and Sundays, respectively. It is edited by Blanchard Jerrold, son of the late Douglas Jerrold. Its influence with the laboring poor is very great. It is a paper of sixty columns. Lloyd is immensely wealthy. His establishment covers four acres of ground. He recently gave £3,000 to the Lancashire Distress Fund—nearly equal to Lord Derby's subscription. The weekly Times, (not the daily,) the weekly Reynolds', and the News of the World, (not the illustrated,) circulate respectively two hundred thousand, one hundred thousand, and one hundred and fifty thousand. Reynolds' has three publications, all of them profitable. He is the author of a series of trashy stories. His income is rated at £14,000, or $70,000 per annum. A magazine of Cobb and Robinson literature, called the American Scrap Book, is also published in London, and is immensely successful. So with Beadle's Dime Novels. Mr. Pierce Egan is the first of the English novelette writers, and the architect of the London Journal

The London Journal is the first of the cheap sensation papers, circulating upward of 300,000 copies weekly; John Gilbert condescends to illustrate it, and Mr. Pierce Egan is its story writer. The distinctively Sunday press is led by the Newsman, 150,000 circulation, and the Despatch, 40,000. The latter is the ablest, and one of its editors, Mr. Bayle Bernard, is an American. There are no Sunday newspapers in any of the other great cities of the United Kingdom. The leading paper in London is the tri-weekly Scotsman, 15,000. There are 1,400 daily, weekly and monthly publications in the United Kingdom, one-half of which emanate from London. The sporting papers lead off with Bell's Life, 60,000 weekly, at sixpence per copy, although the Sporting Life published 500,000 on the occasion of the recent fight. There are some queer publications here which have enormous sales, as Bradshaw's Guides—seven in number—of which the six-penny one circulates 200,000 copies. The Directory of London enumerates 5,600 streets, and is a book of 2,500 pages.

MADEMOISELLE MAUPIN.

ONE of the most singular and remarkable women of a peculiar type was Mlle. Maupin, born 1763, and who was married against her will at an early age. She fell in love, during the absence of her husband, with the fencing-master Seranne, and fled with him to Marseilles, when she was obliged to follow the theatre for a living, and where she soon became a great favorite with the public. Her lover instructed her in the art of fencing, and she soon displayed such a skill in this art, that she surpassed her master, and was able to challenge the most expert professors. A singular circumstance forced her to leave Marseilles. A young girl from one of the first families in the city fell in love with her, and rejected every other connection. The young girl was sent to the convent, in which Mademoiselle Maupin, also, entered as a novice, and where she lived with the young girl until she commenced to feel weary in her solitary confinement. She then plotted to elope with her companion. A nun had just been buried. Mademoiselle Maupin dug up the corpse at night, placed it in the bed of her friend, made a fire under the bed, and fled unnoticed at the moment when the convent was consumed by the flames. Her crime, however, was discovered; she was separated from her victim, (which proceeding, by the way, cost the lives of two policemen,) and placed her before a court. She was condemned to be burned, but fled, after having bribed the judge, and the execution was done in contumacious only. She now wore male attire for several years, and led a very restless life, until she came to Paris, where she made her debut as "Pallas," in the opera of Cardinus, but under a different name. She was very handsome; and from the beginning, the public was in her favor, the more so as she combined with her beauty talents of a varied nature.

She could not read a note of music, but her astonishing memory supplied the defect. Of the intemperate violence of her criminal loves and her wonderful ability in handling arms, things are told which seem almost incredible. Her colleague once offended her. She dressed herself, as usual, in male attire, seized him on the Place des Victoires, and belabored him with an immense club in such a merciless manner, that the poor devil remained insensible in the square. As trophies of victory, she took his watch and snuff-box. As Dumesnil told, during rehearsal, of this adventure the next morning, (talking a la Falstaff of robbers and murderers,) she listened to him patiently, until he had finished his story. She then explained the whole matter, and as a proof of the truth gave him back the watch and snuff-box. Another colleague, Thevenard, received for a moral sermon, which he delivered to her on her conduct, such a tremendous slap, that he fell his full length on the floor of the theatre, and for some time hid himself from the revenge of the Amazon. She manifested up to her death a singular passion for beautiful women and girls, and this passion gave rise frequently to the most ludicrous scenes. She was challenged by the husbands of three married women, with whom she kept up a desperate flirtation at a masquerade ball; they were all three wounded so severely that she had to leave Paris. In Brussels, she became the mistress of the Duke of Bavaria, who, however, being disgusted with her violence, left her. She returned again to Paris, gathered around once more all her lovers, even her first husband, and the fencing master Seranne, and then retired into a convent, where she died.

EXTRAORDINARY SUPERSTITION IN FRANCE.—The following extraordinary affair has caused great excitement in the town and neighborhood of Havre: As a sportsman named Lemonnier was out shooting in a small wood not far from the cemetery of St. Adresse, he found the dead body of an old woman wrapped up in a shroud. He immediately informed the authorities, and the body was recognized as that of a Mme. Allain, aged eighty-two, buried at St. Adresse on the 24th ult. It was at first supposed that the corpse had been disinterred for the purpose of stealing any jewelry that might have been buried with it, but a closer examination having shown that the corpse had been deprived of the skin, and that the chest and abdomen had been cut open, it was concluded that some believer in witchcraft had taken the skin and fat to use as charms in his incantations. It appears that a belief in the magical virtues of human remains is prevalent in that neighborhood, for only a few months since a young mason dug up a body in the same cemetery, cut off one hand and burned it to ashes, which he mixed with gunpowder, in the belief that he should then be able to shoot game without his gun making any report to attract the notice of the garde champetre.

FASCINATING ADONIS.—A good story is told of a chap in North Carolina, who went the entire figure in the way of courting all the girls who would have him, without asking for any of them to die off, as the law directs. After having married his thirteenth, some of his first loves came down upon him, and had him lodged in jail. But a person so fond of liberty, and who could get into Hymen's noose with such ease, found little difficulty in getting out of the "jug;" and the next news of him he was running at large with a heavy reward offered for his apprehension. He was soon recognized by a gentleman, who, anxious to get the reward, invited him to his house, desired him to sit down—called his wife to chat with him, as an inducement to detain him there—while he made some excuse for leaving him a few moments, and started for a constable to arrest the runaway. What was the poor man's astonishment, on returning with the constable to find the gay Lothario—taking advantage of his short absence—had absconded with his wife. This made the fellow's stock of wives on hand fourteen.

KEEPING ONE'S WORD.—Sir William Napier was one day taking a long country walk near Freshford, when he met a little girl about five years old, sobbing bitterly over a broken bowl; she had dropped and broken it in bringing it back from the field to which she had taken her father's dinner in it, and she said she would be beaten on her return home. Then, with a sudden gleam of hope, she innocently looked up into his face, and said: "But yee can mend it, can't yee?" Sir William smilingly explained that he could not mend the bowl, but the trouble he could, by the gift of a sixpence to buy another. However, on opening his purse, it was empty of silver, and he had to make amends by promising to meet his little friend in the same spot at the same hour next day. The child, entirely trusting him, went on her way comforted. On his return he found an invitation awaiting him to dine in Bath the following evening to meet some one whom he specially wished to see. He hesitated for some time, trying to calculate the possibility of giving the meeting to his little friend of the broken bowl, and of still being in time for the dinner-party in Bath; but finding this could not be, he wrote to decline accepting the invitation on the plea of a "pre-engagement," saying to his family: "I cannot disappoint her, she trusted me so implicitly."

THE UTILITY OF MELANCHOLY.—Melancholy is the stock in trade which novelists have always resorted to, when in search of something which could be woven into a tissue of out-and-out sentiment. What trees are to the landscape-painter, are melancholy yonths to the romancer. Miserable men are always in great demand in fictitious life. Here is thrown in a dismal night; there, a ghostly lane; here a moss-encrusted ruin; there, a ballroom with lights and music and the timed fall of the dancers' feet. Yet the picture is incomplete; there is a lack of something to add intensity to the gloom, or something to act as a foil to the sparkle and merriment, and the miserable man fits it exactly, either as deepener or foil. Put him out in the rain of the dismal night, without friends or umbrella, fix him in a statuesque position at the end of the ghostly lane; statue him in the nave of the moss-encrusted ruin with his face buried in his hands; or give him a prominent position in the doorway of the ballroom, with a curl of misanthropy upon his colorless lips, and in his dark smouldering eyes

"—A vital scorn of all,
As if the worst had fallen that could befall."

and your picture is thorough, fervent, and exactly sentimental. He is never out of place; and his dullness never obscures the brighter features of the scene. He is a model of propriety, whether in a bandit's cave or the High Court of Chancery; whether he raises his sonorous wail and bursts into inevitable tears upon the mountain-top, or in the valleys. He is thoroughly cosmopolitan, and his lachrymal existence affords an effective undertone in fictions of every style and character. Heroines invariably cleave to misanthropes; and superior capacities for the tear-duct, and a broken heart and an embittered existence, are sufficient excuses for the elopements of heiresses with their possessors. No one can doubt the propriety of a Gretna Green marriage with a youth who has been thoroughly used up in the school of misfortune. Who, then, shall say that misery is not useful in some capacity?

WHAT is the difference between a settler in the far West and a city-thief? One tills the clearing, and the other goes in for clearing the till.

A PREACHER'S word should be law only when it is gospel.

THE BACHELOR'S DREAM EXPLAINED.

I think you remember that some months ago,
I was courting a handsome young girl;
Since then I went traveling up country, you know,
And I've now lost the run of my Belle.

I loved her so dearly—I do love her yet,
Of course she must know very well;
Indeed, I am ready to go in a fit
Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

I've made an inquiry of all the young chaps—
Been searching at every hotel;
I've now and then called on old Schiedam Schnapps
Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

Kept running all day like a fool in the street,
To search for another young girl;
And every fine lady I chance for to meet,
I've inquired for my old lover, Belle.

I start for a Photographic Gallery,
To look for my sweet little Belle;
And who in the name you think I should see?
A face of that very same girl!

I then said, "Dear Belle, I've caught you at last;
Are you lying, or here in disguise?"
And what do you think, my friends, it was?
A picture of her in life size.

Now to be seen at H. BUSH'S Gallery, corner of Post, Market and Montgomery streets, entrance opposite the aolic Hall.

A voice divine shall talk in each stream,
The stars shall look like worlds of love,
And this earth be all one beautiful dream,
In our eyes—if thou'lt be mine.

KATY'S VALENTINE.

Among the many fair and bright,
My fancy early singled thee;
Then bend on me thine eyes of light,
And all my love shall flow to thee.

MAGGIE'S VALENTINE.

One kind heart to warmly prize,
While the light of pure affection
Beams within thy gentle eyes.

ALLIE'S VALENTINE.

May'st thou live in joy forever!
Naught from thee true pleasure sever;
From thy heart arise no sigh,
And no tear bedew thine eye;
Joys be many, cares be few,
Smooth the path thou shalt pursue;
And Heaven's richest blessings shine,
Ever on both thee and thine.

NETTIE'S VALENTINE.

Oh, speak not of daisies or rosehuds of Spring,
Or bright pearly dewdrops, or any such thing,
For thy worth and virtues much more do combine,
And gladly I'd take thee for my Valentine.

BETTER THAN PETROLEUM—A REMARKABLE DISCOVERY.

PETROLEUM has been playfully denominated the huile of Fortune. Certain it is that every one is endeavoring to turn it. Pennsylvania led off some time since, the farmers dipping deeply into any hole where it was supposed that oil abounded—it was on account of their greasy fingers, probably, that the rebel raiders came to slip through them so easily. And Pennsylvania is not alone in its possession of Petroleum. A friend of mine who resides in Cattaraugus county, New York—a county that heretofore has produced nothing but cows and cheese—writes me that "discoveries" have been made there, and that people are boring the ground and each other with excellent prospects of eventual success in finding something, if they only hold to the search long enough.

Even to this coast the excitement has penetrated. Oil shares have supplanted mining ones in the market—perhaps because they go down the popular throat so much easier. Los Angeles, the City of the Angels, has acquired a sudden notoriety. Discoveries have been made in its vicinity, and the inhabitants now go wandering about with oil cans in their hands, instead of the harps they should carry, to justify the nomenclature of their town. Of an oil ranch sold to an enterprising person or parson of this city for $23,000, the half was immediately resold for $50,000—more than twice what the whole property cost—and that half again was speedily resold in New York for $100,000, to be since organized into a joint stock company upon a basis which makes that half interest represent $400,000. This is the claim of which the Eastern papers inform us that the shares, immediately upon being put into the market, rose from their par value of $1,000 to $500 premium.

The interior papers come to us laden with remarkable developments. In one case, a number of men running a tunnel to tap their ledge well below the surface, were driven out by a rush of oil into their works. One of the number who thought the alarm when first given was simply a piece of oily-gammon, and made no immediate effort at escape, was overtaken by the billows of oil, which of course rolled noiselessly along, and perished miserably. His body when recovered was so saturated with the inflammable fluid that combustion ensued upon its exposure to the pure air of an upper level, burning brightly for some hours like a paraffine candle. Several learned pundits who examined the phenomena critically came to the conclusion that the burning was accelerated and assisted by the fact that he was a wick-ed man. A friend of mine, however, recently ordained, who has charge of a small parish just on the edge of Oakland, remarks that this only furnishes another instance of how the most inveterate sinner may become a shining light at last. The assessor of the county where the sad event occurred, a gentleman whose income is very much dependent upon the growth of the population of his district, takes a practical view of the affair, and says, in a private note to the writer of this article, that as no incremation of inhabitants has occurred within the past five years, cremation might as well begin. It will gratify those who take an interest in bereaved families to know that the ashes of the unfortunate man were gathered together in an urn and forwarded by express to his wife and children, by whom they were eventually sold to a soapboiler, the old lady remarking as she concluded the negotiation that the husband and father never earned anything for the support of the family until he himself was urned. The joke was a bad one on the part even of a woman who had met with a great disappointment in business, but perhaps it should be pardoned in view of the afflicting circumstances under which it was uttered.

But enough of generalizing; it would have been better, peradventure, had I come to the remarkable discovery which it is the purpose of this paper to set forth, in the beginning.

Foresceing the excitement which plainly enough was to be engendered by this new source of wealth, and inferring that if oil were found in the interior, no adequate reason could be offered why it should not be found in this city or its vicinity. I commenced researches and experiments. For a few days, indeed for many days, I met with no success at all; by accident at dinner one day I struck oil in a salad, which promised to afford satisfactory results, but inquiry of the landlady disclosed the fact that it was olive oil, and everybody knows that petroleum is of a delicate straw color. Let me here remark that the butter of boarding-houses occasionally deluded me, by its remarkable resemblance in both smell and color to the object of my search, but it was never found on the table in a quantity which would justify one in supposing that the "lead" whence it came was either a very permanent or extensive one.

One day I happened to be strolling out in the neighborhood of the Mission; aside from the probability of finding oil there, I consider it a good thing to go to the Mission occasionally, for it sobers the mind and brings one by its solemn suggestions out from the frivolous habit of thought and levity of conduct, which a residence in the city is very apt to inspire and foster. For it is only on going out there that one comes to realize how sweet are the uses of adversity and how cheap rent is, if one only consent to live in out-of-the-way places and raise poultry for the market, and japonicas and sunflowers for bouquets.

But this is a digression; as we were remarking, one day I happened to be strolling along in the neighborhood of the Mission, thinking much of many things, but principally of the difficulty in this world of buying things upon credit without paying up old debts, and wondering if there be not, beyond the moon, a bright and blissful sphere, where book accounts are held of no account whatever in law, and where creditors are compelled to black the boots and do other mean and menial offices for people who are so unfortunate as to be indebted to them, when my eye encountered a hole in the ground, not large, but deep.

Acting upon the impulse of the moment I cried: It is well! The remark was perhaps a hasty one, but I could not curb my emotions at the sight.

Leaning my head over the aperture I smelt something fishy, and by dropping down pebbles convinced myself that something was there. A muffled splash was heard, something like that of the doughnut when dropped into the lard wherein it is to be cooked—by and by the reader will see how I philosophically account for these sounds, in the light of my present knowledge. From the time which the pebbles occupied in falling, I concluded that the well I had found must be about one thousand two hundred and eighty-five feet in depth—either that figure or very near to it. After carefully concealing the hole by putting up a large board above it, marked RAILROAD CROSSING—LOOK OUT FOR THE ENGINE WHEN THE BELL RINGS, I returned to town, deferring exploration of this newly-discovered hole until the holidays came round. When Christmas day was over I renewed my work.

Provided with a rope of several thousand feet in length, a windlass and a lass to wind it up, several sperm candles, a legal tinder and steel which somebody stole from the Sub Treasury, a pack of cards, the last municipal report containing faithful but not pretty pictures of the Supervisors, the Art Union catalogue, and a fine tooth comb, I reached the mouth of my well about dusk, and prepared to descend, confident that I should find truth at the bottom. Now I never felt fear in my life, perhaps because I have always made a practice of getting out from the way immediately that it occurred to me that there was any danger, but if I here confess that at this critical moment, suspended over that yawning chasm and plainly distinguishing a suffocating smell that would have led the unscientific man to suspect a deposit or stratum of dead cats at the bottom, I did experience a momentary tremor, let not the reader blame me, but consider how he himself would have felt in a similar fix. The young lady who was the companion of my rash adventure—not the great experimentalizer, Friar Bacon, himself, ever indulged in a rasher—began to pay out the rope with a rapid but firm hand, and I soon was going down, down, into the terrible shaft. When perhaps a third or a half of the perilous descent had been accomplished, the young lady above leaned over the edge of the aperture and remarked that I never was so low in her estimation before, adding that an easier way of going to Greece no one could plan. The exertion was too much for her; the line slipped from her fingers, and I was precipitated to the bottom with a rapidity which for several moments deprived me of breath. On recovering myself, I found myself floating like one of those cork tapers formerly used in sick chambers, on a perfect sea of oil, smooth to the touch but not pleasant to the taste. Striking vigorously out, and striking oil at every stroke, I soon gained the shore. A moment's examination disclosed the fact that my lines had indeed fallen in profitable if not pleasant places. It was not petroleum I had discovered, but Cod Liver Oil! of a purity and strength never before seen in market!! It was some time before I was sufficiently master of myself to shout to the mistress of my heart above and acquaint her with my wonderful discovery; neither was I able at the moment to fully appreciate its value. Here was the salvation of millions of lungs; here was what should mend human bellows until the crack of doom, making for me that fortune of which I had often dreamed but never very confidently expected. It was only necessary to get a pump, or a pair of pumps, raise the oil to the surface, and bottle it. Once bottled the process was easy; I would have agents in all the interior towns, sending packages to every home in the land, by express, marked, in the large roman hand of my handsome friend, John Kelly, c. o. d.—by such means no losses could occur in business and . . . but I anticipate. An examination of the ground soon satisfied me of how this wonderful deposit occurred. The bank above had been a fishing bank in a primeval period and the livers of the cod were thrown down this sink, where they sunk. Indeed, finding many sounds lying there still, in a perfect state of preservation, I did not long hesitate in determining that they were the "sounds" already mentioned, which I heard when leaning over the brink of the well.

My explorations are not yet finished; indeed I might say that they are scarcely yet commenced, though at the present moment I am actively engaged in conducting them. In fact, the only difficulty which attends my present enterprise is the difficulty of getting out—and a similar annoyance after getting into a good thing has been my experience before. Once in for it, one hates to back out, but I should like to find a friend who would take a few feet off my hands; for I have assessments to pay, and the young woman above, who lowered me down, must be provided for—oil does not calm the agitated waves of her temper if her wardrobe is not provided for. This is written from the depths of the well, and floated to the upper air by a fish's bladder, from which I have improvised a balloon. This is very much like a Petroleum adventure—who will help me out—or jump in and suffer with me.

INIGO.

THE TWO FURROWS.

THE spring-time came—but not with mirth—
The banner of our trust,
And with it the best hopes of earth,
Were trailing in the dust.

The farmer saw the shame from far,
And stopped his plough afield:
"Not the blade of peace but the brand of war
This arm of mine must wield.

"When traitor hands that flag would stain,
Their homes let women keep;
Until its stars burn bright again,
Let others sow and reap."

The farmer sighed—"A lifetime long
The plough has been my trust;
And sure it were an ardent wrong
To leave it now to rust."

With ready strength the farmer tore
The iron from the wood,
And to the village smith he bore
That ploughshare stout and good.

The blacksmith's arms were bare and brown,
The bellows wheezed and roared;
The farmer flung his ploughshare down—
"Now forge me out a sword!"

And then a merry, merry chime
The sounding anvil rung—
Good sooth, it was a nobler rhyme
Than ever poet sung.

The blacksmith wrought with skill that day,
The blade was keen and bright;
And now where thickest is the fray
The farmer leads the fight.

Not as of old that blade he sways
To break the meadow's sleep,
But through the rebel ranks he lays
A furrow broad and deep.

The farmer's face is burned and brown,
But light is on his brow;
Right well he wots what blessings crown
The furrow of the Plough.

"But better is to-day's success"—
Thus ran the farmer's word—
"For nations yet unborn shall bless
This furrow of the Sword."

[C. H. Webb, in "Lyrics of Loyalty."]

CADER IDRIS—THE CHAIR OF IDRIS.

I AM an old bachelor now, the object of an interest—not, perhaps, wholly unselfish—to my nephews and nieces. Be it so. They will not have long to wait. The one bright thread in the darksome web of my life was snapped, rudely snapped, many a weary year ago, and I am only sorry when a new springtime comes round and finds me still among the living.

In the autumn of 1829 I was staying in one of the wildest and most secluded districts of Wales, not, as now, a gray-haired, broken man, but young, happy, and rich in friends, in prospects, and above all, in that elastic spirit of hopefulness that forms the best heritage of those who begin the world. Talglyn Hall, one of those moss-grown stone mansions whose weather-beaten masonry looks old enough to be coeval with the eternal hills that overshadow them, was the place of my temporary abode. The Hall—the name of which I have slightly altered—was the ancestral residence of a Welsh gentleman whom I shall call Griffith. I was his friend and guest; indeed, we were distantly related, and I was to have been the husband of his youngest daughter. Dear, lost Ellen! with what painful distinctness, after all these years, does her gentle image rise before me, in all the bloom of that youthful beauty on which the hand of Time was never to be laid. I often fancy that she stands beside me as I sit in my elbow-chair, brooding over the past, over the golden sands that ran out so early, and in a strain of faintly audible music, or in the sigh of the summer wind, I fondly dream that I hear the voice of Ellen. Forgive me, reader! I will wander from the point no more, but briefly tell how I won and lost her.

Rambling through Wales during the summer of the preceding year, sketching and fishing, and seeking all the benefit which the pure air and exercise could confer on a constitution somewhat impaired by study and hard work at the bar, a singular whim possessed me. This was no other than to seek out some remote connections of my mother's, who were known to dwell peaceably on their hereditary acres somewhere in the Principality, but between whom and my immediate relatives no intercourse had taken place for at least a generation. I was shut up by stress of rain in a wretched little inn at Trysilioes, unable to climb mountains, fish, or take sketches, when a letter arrived from the sister to whom I had written for information. At the point where the four closely-written pages—for postage was, in those times, a costly item—were traversed by what feminine correspondents called "crossings," I found the following sentence: "The name of the family you ask about is Griffith, people with a long pedigree, of course, being Welsh, and I believe with a grand old house and a good property; they live at Talglyn Hall, at the foot of Cader Idris, so if you go that way you can look them up. It was the father of the present squire who quarreled with grandpapa, fifty years ago, and mamma says he behaved shamefully, but she has forgotten in what manner—they are, you know, our second cousins," etc.

On such slight events, to all appearances, do our fortunes depend, that this trivial letter may be truly said to have colored my whole future life. I have often tried to speculate on what that life might have been, had my sister delayed writing but a single day more, in which case I should have been gone from the neighborhood before the arrival of her letter. However, the letter came; the information it gave reached me at a critical moment, just as I was about to start with post-horses for a more civilized place. It so happened, too, that I was within a few miles of Cader Idris. I could see the blue peak of the steep mountain, looming gigantic through the rain, even from the little window of the inn parlor in which I had been for three days a prisoner. Talglyn Hall must, therefore, be of easy access. I countermanded the post-chaise: I wrote a note, couched in that diplomatic style on which young men plume themselves, and sent it by a messenger to "Squire Griffith's." Before the long summer day was spent, Mr. Griffith answered the note in person. I found him a capital specimen of the Welsh gentleman—spirited, hospitable, and rather choleric and imperious. But the brighter side of his character was the one most prominent, and that it was which was presented to me. He greeted me with a frank manliness that put my diplomacy to the rout, and insisted on bearing me off straightway to the Hall. I was his cousin, he said, and quite a near relation in a Cambrian point of view, and I must be his guest, in spite of the silly misunderstanding of half a century back. No, no; blood was thicker than water, and he should feel himself insulted if any kinsman came within ten miles of his roof-tree without harboring there. Thus it occurred that I became a visitor at Talglyn Hall.

Mr. Griffith, a widower, had five children to cheer his hearth, and of these three were daughters. The two eldest were handsome enough, but Ellen, their younger sister, then scarcely seventeen, was as beautiful and winning as a fairy. No wonder that I admired her. Admired is a cold, pale phrase. She was born to be loved, and I loved her with a deep, strong love over which time has never gained the mastery. I do not wish to linger on that happy period of alternate hope and fear, of broken words eked out by glances, and all the petulant changes of passion. Suffice it that my love was returned at last, and that before my long visit was at an end Ellen had plighted me her simple troth. I went honestly to Mr. Griffith, and told him all. He was not displeased. He appeared, in fact, hardly to be surprised. Lovers, indeed, are generally very transparent in their wily stratagems for hoodwinking the world, and even the most guileless household is speedily aware of the progress of an attachment. But Mr. Griffith, though not averse to receiving me as a son-in-law, was not willing that his daughter should marry at seventeen, and was besides desirous that time should test whether we, the principal parties in the case, really knew our own minds. We both thought this decision very tyrannical and absurd. I am sure that it was right, and wise. For a year Ellen and I were to be separated. I was to work heartily at the bar, as before; the Griffiths were to travel, to visit watering-places and cities, and to vary their usual retired mode of life, in order that Ellen might see something of the world before she irrevocably fixed her fate in it. And, if all went well, and we young people continued of the same opinion, after the lapse of a twelvemonth, why then—

Then! How cruel seemed the suspense and the banishment; how certain that our sentiments would be unchanged a year hence, fifty years hence, my younger readers may ask their own hearts. We obeyed. I not only obtained some credit as a rising junior at the bar, where I already possessed a certain footing—more due, I dare say, to circumstance than merit—but I won the consent and approbation of all my relatives to the match. I was not dependent on them or on my profession for support, but Squire Griffith was a great stickler for such matters, and he was not easy until I had induced my mother to write him a letter solemnly abjuring the feud between their parents—the reason of which had been, I believe, a dispute at long whistle—and consenting formally to the marriage. And now the weary waiting was over, the year was out, and I was at Talglyn Hall again to claim my bride. All went smilingly with us. Ellen had the old loving look in her dear blue eyes; she had been courted and flattered, but no one had been able to win away her heart from me, and the Squire admitted that never had a probation turned out more satisfactory than ours. All the family were kind, warm-hearted people; they welcomed me cordially among them; they were willing to hail me as a brother, though they did grudge a little at times that I should rob them of the light of their home, the darling of them all, for Ellen was both. She had been very pretty a year before, but had now expanded like a flower, and was as sweet a type of the more fragile order of womanhood as ever existed. I was surprised to see how much she had developed in so short a time, but she loved me none the less for the greater experience of life which she had gained in the past year. Our wedding-day was fixed; the preparations were nearly completed, and my sisters, who were to be bridesmaids jointly with Ellen's sisters, were shortly expected at Talglyn. And now but a few days intervened between me and the crowning happiness of my life—that happiness which was never to be.

I have painted nothing as yet but a picture of hope and happiness, a sunny sea and white-sailed pleasure-barks gaily gliding over the soft summer waves. Now comes the blacker sketch of wreek and storm. Ellen had one fault, if fault be not too harsh a word, one flaw in her nature. She had a pretty waywardness, an impatience of contradiction that never degenerated into peevishness, never became imperious, but which in one endowed with a less sweet temper would infallibly have done so. As it was, it rather took the form of a half playful defiance, so winning, so full of grace, that you could scarcely have the heart to wish it away. But there were times when Ellen's petulant caprice became a source of terror to those who loved her best. I have known her persist in maintaining her seat on a plunging, kicking horse, full of vice and mettle and which exerted every sinew and every artifice to hurl from the saddle its slender but unconquerable rider. Equally, I have seen her run, mocking our cowardice, along the trunk of a fallen tree that bridged a cataract; slippery though that tree was with the washing of ceaseless spray, and perched at a fearful height above the ragged rocks and the dark pool below. And in a mountain excursion, no one, not even her daredevil young brothers, ventured so close to the most dangerous precipices as Ellen did, laughing the while. Yet she was no Amazon, but when the whim was over, showed all a girl's timidity in face of peril; it was contradiction that nettled her to rashness. One evening, after a happy day spent partly on the hills and partly in boating on the little lake, the conversation turned, somehow, on the superstitions of Wales. One legend called forth another, and none of her relatives had such a store of these weird tales as Ellen, or told them so charmingly and simply. At last she related a particular story which I have but too much reason to remember, which has burnt into my brain like a fiery brand, the story of the Lady of Cader Idris. The legend has reference to the Welsh proverb, so old, that it is by some considered anterior to even Merlin, that "he who spends a night in the chair of Cader Idris will be found mad, dead, or a poet." Tradition relates that Merlin sat there, and that Taliesin also went through the dread ordeal that touched his lips with the fire of prophecy.

"You know," broke in young Herbert Griffith, "the gap cut in the live rock, on the high peak where the cairn is, just above the cliff? It looks like the throne of some queer old king. I showed it to you when we went shooting dotterils. Beg your pardon, Ellen!"

Ellen went on to relate how, long ago, in the thirteenth century, the lady of the manor, a beautiful and willful heiress, called by her vassals the Lady of Cader Idris, had resolved to undergo this terrible trial in the hopes of becoming imbued with the spirit of poetry. How, being a lady of rare courage and headstrong will, she had persisted in her resolve, in spite of the entreaties of her kindred, the prayers of her tenants, and the authority of her confessor. How she had gone up alone to the haunted hill-top, where, as legends tell, spectres keep a world-long watch over buried treasure, and had faced storm, and darkness, and all the terrors of the visible and the viewless. Finally, how she had been found in the morning, stark and dead, seated in the rocky throne on blue Idris, with her long dark hair floating over the stones as she sat in an attitude that mocked life, and with an expression of awful fear stamped on her open eyes and fair pale face. The tradition added that, on account of her rebellion against the priest's commands, the church had denied her poor body Christian burial, and that she had been laid in silence and stealth, by the hands of sorrowing kinsmen, under a cairn of loose pebbles on the hill-top.

Then Ellen went to her harp, and sang us first the wild Welsh ditty that some bard had composed in elder days, and then the polished verses which Mrs. Hemans had penned on the same theme. Nor was it till the last notes of the harp and the sweet voice had long died away that we recovered from the impression of the weird and mournful tale, and began to question its authenticity and to challenge its probability. I remember we all took part, in a sportive way, against Ellen and the legend. Our wishes were, no doubt, to tease, harmlessly, the darling and spoiled child of the household, and also perhaps to atone to ourselves for having been for a time more completely under the spell of romance than we cared to acknowledge. But to start a discussion is like rolling a stone down hill. It starts gently, sliding down grassy banks and springing daintily from mound to mound, then leaps with huge bounds, gaining force every instant, till it thunders from crag to crag, and crashes into the valley below. Our controversy grew warm and lively, almost bitter. Ellen was piqued and ruffled. She had told us one of her favorite tales, one which she had loved and dwelt upon, and which was grown to be almost a part of herself, and we had listened—and laughed. She had not the experience that ripper years impart, and which would have made her suspect that our derision was in a measure defensive and over-strained, and she was vexed, and showed it. She was quite angry with her jeering brothers, but I came in for the full weight of her indignation.

"Why was I incredulous? Did I think woman's nature so frivolous and cowardly that nothing brave or self-devoted could be looked for from a woman?"

To this I replied, with provoking gravity. "That I thought the story a pretty one, but that it was as improbable as the adventures of King Arthur and his knights, and that I never saw or heard of any female capable of confronting so much risk and discomfort." Finally, I declared the "Lady of the Cader Idris" a pure invention of some crack-brained harper. Ellen's scornful eyes flashed, and she tossed her golden ringlets as she turned away. All might have gone well had not some mischievous fiend whispered to me to improve my victory. So I did. I waxed very witty and satirical, and the company applauded, all but the squire, who was asleep, and Ellen, who stamped her little foot angrily on the floor, exclaiming:

"I will show you that a woman dares do more than you fancy. I will go through this ordeal, that you believe impossible. We shall see who is right, you or I."

And she left the room at once. When she came back, half an hour later, she was quite calm and unruffled: she joined in the conversation as usual, and spoke pleasantly of the projects for pike fishing in the Llyn, for a late picnic to some celebrated point of view, and a ride to the county town. But there was a feverish restlessness in her air, and she broke off rapidly from talking on one subject to diverge to another. She sat down, when asked, to harp or piano, but she played but a few bars, and then rose again, saying she could not remember a tune. This change of manner caused me some concern, and I went up to her, and said in a low tone:

"Ellen, are you ill?"

"Ill? No," she answered, in an abstracted manner, and moved away.

"You are not offended with me?" I began. "I did not mean—"

"No, I am not offended," she answered, with some constraint, and then began to take the keenest interest in the artificial flies Herbert was tying.

We exchanged no other word until every one had retired to rest, and it came to my turn to wish her "Good night," as usual. She took my hand between her own little white fingers, and for a moment gazed in my face with a strange look that has haunted me ever since—that will haunt me to my dying hour. Sorrow, reproach, affection, and an under-current of firm but hidden determination, were blended in that glance—the last that I ever received from those fond blue eyes that I had hoped would be a sunshine in my home from youth to age. And her lips murmured the old trivial phrase, "Good night," as if it had a new meaning. She turned away.

"Ellen!" said I, springing after her, "one moment, Ellen!"

She did not seem to hear. She glided from me, and was gone. One moment I stood irresolute. False pride made me ashamed of my anxiety. Even then, after the loss of one precious moment, I should have followed, but the squire called to me, candle in hand, from his study door, to say something about to-morrow's pike-fishing, and the opportunity was lost—forever! What might not then have been the magic power of one word of real kindness and contrition! it might have altered the whole current of an existence.

That has been one long and unavailing regret. But the word remained unspoken. I went to my chamber, a quaint room in one of the wings, close to the gray turret where, beneath its conical roof of slate, the alarm bell hung. I slowly undressed, often drawing aside the curtains, often peering forth through the Elizabethan casement of diamond panes, many of which were darkened by the heavy growth of the ivy without. All was ghostly still in the garden below, where the stiff hedges of clipped holly, the terraces fringed with box-trees and hornbeam, and the broad, old-fashioned walks were white with moonshine. An owl was hooting in the wood, and the mastiff in the court-yard bayed mournfully from time to time, and rattled his chain. The moon was high and bright, but black clouds were sailing across the sky; and as I looked, a sudden glow lit up the horizon, as if a trap door had been opened above some fiery gulf, then vanished as quickly. "There will be a storm to-night," I muttered, as I turned from the window for the last time. I was very ill satisfied with myself, and, as often happens, I perversely chose to justify my own conduct by blaming poor Ellen. "She had no right to be so positive and so petulant," I said to myself. It augured ill for our future happiness that she should resent the idle words so deeply. But in the morning I would speak to her, reason with her—in the morning? We are blind, blind!

My prediction that there would be a storm that night was fulfilled to the letter. A storm there was. I was awakened by a peal of thunder that sounded in my sleeping ears as if the trumpet of the archangel were calling sinners to judgment.

Crash upon crash, roar upon roar, till the vault of Heaven was full of the giant sound, and the strong stone mansion rooked like a living creature in fear. The blaze of the lightning, broad and bright, flooded the whole sky with an incessant lurid red, and between the stunning bursts of the thunder might be heard the howl of the wind and the hurdling of the hail and rain. An awful night. A night for shipwreck and ruin, and death of travellers on lonely moorland roads, and toppling down of gray steeples that had mocked at the gales of centuries. A grim, wild night. Presently the thunder died away, all but a sudden growl afar off, and the flashes ceased, and rain and wind went on lashing and tearing at the casement.

I fell asleep, and a strange dream I had. I dreamed of the high peak of Idris, with its storm-lashed terraces of mossy stone, the cairn of loose pebbles, and the rocky chair, deep cut in the very brow of the horrid cliff, with a yawning precipice below. And the chair was not empty. No. It had a tenant, and that tenant bore a female shape. I could see the white robe fluttering through the blackness of night, and the loosened hair, and the hand that was pressed to the eyes, as if to shut out some ghostly sight of things unspeakable, while its fellow grasped the rocky rim of the throne. Then the thunder bellowed over head, and the lightning flashed in fiery forks and hissing zigzags, ringing the hill-top with a flaming diadem, blazing, red and menacing, through the abyss below, and illuminating with a dreadful light that solitary form, alone amid the wrath of the elements. The tempest broke in its might upon the peak of Idris; hail, rain, wind, swept over the mountain as with a besom, and the pale form in the fantastic chair endured them all. Strange, unearthly shrieks were blended with the howl of the wind; wild and dismal pageants trooped by amid the driving mists and sheets of blinding rain; and by one last glare of the lightning I saw the figure remove the hand that hid its face. The face of a young girl—of Ellen—but so ghastly with terror, so full of agony and nameless horror, that I awoke, trembling and unnerved, with great heat-drops on my forehead, such as excessive bodily pain might have called forth. The storm still raged, but more feebly. Yes, it was subsiding now. I sank back again, but this time into a heavy, dreamless slumber. I awoke in the golden, brilliant morning; the sky was blue, the birds were singing gayly, and the verdure of the country seemed fresher and fairer than before the storm. My spirits rose as I dressed; I was in the best of tempers, and I made a resolution that I would not chide Ellen for her wilful conduct of the preceding evening, but would be very considerate and kind, and would even say I was sorry to have hurt her feelings by a careless word. I went down to the breakfast-room. The Squire was there, with his two elder daughters and his eldest son, while young Herbert came in with his fishing-rod a moment later. But no Ellen. The old butler brought in the urn, after we had exchanged a few remarks, and then, for the first time Ellen's absence was commented upon.

"She is not usually the lazy one," said her father, "Owen, send up Miss Ellen's maid to let her know we are waiting breakfast."

The man went. We chatted on. But Owen came back with a blank look to say, that the maid had found the door locked, and that she had knocked repeatedly, but without getting an answer.

This astonished us all.

"She must be ill!" cried Charlotte, the eldest sister, hastily, leaving the room.

Soon she, too, came back, to say that she had called aloud at the door, but that Ellen would not reply a word.

"Perhaps she has gone out," said Herbert. "The window in the oratory that opens out of her room leads on to the terrace by the greenhouse, and then there are steps to the garden."

"Nonsense," said the Squire, knitting his brows, "that door has been locked these fifty years, and the key lost, too. I'll go myself. I'm afraid she is ill."

We all went up in a body. Two or three of the servants were on the landing-place.

"I am afraid, sir," said the lady's maid, half crying, "something's amiss. We can't hear a sound. It's all as still as death."

Something painful shot across all our minds as we heard this speech.

We neared the door, the squire tapped.

"Ellen! Ellen, love! answer, my darling; are you ill?"

No reply.

Mr. Griffith set his strong shoulder against the door, and by a violent effort, dashed it in. We entered. The room was tenantless—empty.

"She has gone out, after all!" cried Herbert, running to the old oratory, and pointing to the long disused door, now wide open.

"Miss Ellen must have gone out last night," stammered one of the women, "for the bed has not been touched."

Last night! In the storm! Impossible. Yet on tracking further we found on the terrace a bow of riband, drenched and heavy with moisture. It had evidently been dropped by its owner, and all recognized it as Ellen's—on the previous night, before the rain began.

"She must be mad, my poor, poor child," groaned the Squire, "or is she playing us a trick? No, she never could have the heart to trifle with us in such a way."

Suddenly a horrid thought flashed across my mind. My dream! the dispute of the previous night—the strange resolve latent in Ellen's face as she took leave of me—all these came crowding back.

"I know where she is," I cried aloud. "I know it but too well. She is on the mountain, on Cader Idris, dead or mad by this, and I am the accursed cause."

"My poor fellow, your anxiety makes you talk wildly," said the Squire. "Cader Idris, how can she be there? Impossible!"

"She is there," cried I, in an accent of agonized conviction that none could resist, "she spoke of going through the ordeal of the rock-chair last evening; and I, fool that I was, have slept while she was perishing in the tempest. Follow me, and waste no time. For Heaven's dear love be quick, and bring restoratives, if in mercy it be not too late!"

My vehemence bore down all opposition. In less than five minutes we were hurrying to the foot of the mountain. But I outstripped them all. My heart was on fire, and my feet were gifted with unusual speed. Up, among the slippery shale and loose stones, up by bush and crag, by rock and water-course, and by tracks only trodden by the goat, and I stand panting on the terrace, a few feet of peak above, a yawning precipice below. My dream was too terribly realized. There, in the rock-hewn chair, in her muslin dress and mantle of gay plaid, both of them drenched and stained with rain and earth, lay Ellen, cold and dead. Her long fair hair half hid her pale face, and her little hands were tightly clasped together. I clasped her to my breast: I called wildly on her name; I parted the dank hair that hid her face, and on it I saw imprinted the same agony of fear, the same dark horror, as in my fatal dream. But she was dead, my dear, dear Ellen. And I think my heart must have broken then, as I saw her, forever. Since that day the world has been a prison to me.

THE NOVELIST A PHYSICIAN.—Some ten years ago Alexandre Dumas published a large novel, serially, in a political journal. The heroine was represented as a person suffering from consumption, the first stage of which was already passed.

Her perspiration, cough, irritability and moodiness, by turns gay and melancholy, the poetic flights of her imagination; in short, the whole category of phthisis were portrayed with that golden pen which the celebrated novelist still so defiantly holds.

One morning, as he was about to conclude his work, a distinguished person from the court of Louis Philippe called to see the author.

The Marquis de ——— was announced:

"Sir," says the marquis, "is your novel finished?"

"Entirely," was the reply.

"And what becomes of the heroine in the end?"

"You are fond of rare things, Monsieur le Marquis," says the novelist, laughing; "or else you wish to read in Arabian style—beginning at the end."

"I have," replied the visitor, "a more serious motive to justify my curiosity."

"Well, then," says Dumas, "my poor sufferer dies in the last chapter."

"She must recover in that case," said his excellency.

"But the plan has been carried out."

"Then the conclusion must be altered."

"But the dénouement is exceedingly striking."

"Another must be found, however, and you may depend upon my gratitude."

Dumas stared with astonishment at the seigneur.

"Why require this of a fictitious person?" said he.

"Because my only daughter suffers the same malady and the same symptoms you have described, and the death of your heroine would be a mortal blow to the morale of my poor child, who follows her adventures anxiously in every morning's paper."

The far-famed writer pressed the father's hand. He revised the last part of his novel. The heroine was miraculously cured.

Five years afterwards Dumas met a beautiful lady, of transcendent charms, in the salon of M. de Montalivet; she was the marquis's daughter, married, and in the bloom of health.

"She has had four children," said her father, in introducing her.

"And my book four editions," answered the novelist.

ONE of the best dramatic criticism on record is that which Dr. Doran hands down to us as the opinion of a lady after witnessing the rival Romeos—Garrick and Barry. "Had I been Juliet," she said, "to Garrick's Romeo—so ardent and impassioned was he, I should have expected that he would have come up to me in the balcony; but had I been Juliet to Barry's Romeo—so tender, so eloquent and so seductive was he, I certainly would have gone down to him."

THE PEACE RUMORS.

UNFORTUNATELY the peace rumors which we spread before our readers last week, have proven of a piece with former ones, ending, not in smoke, but in something even less substantial—the thinnest of air.

It may be that in the use of the word "unfortunately," in the above connection, we suffered ourselves, in deference to the prevalent sentiment, to be betrayed into an expression which scarcely fits the case. For we are not quite sure that our nation is yet ripe for peace, or that a peace patched up in any such hurried manner as the rumored one of last date seemed to be, would prove either profitable or permanent. The packers of that cotton bale, the Constitution, unthinkingly stowed a burning coal away in its centre, which, after smouldering through long years, broke out in the flame and fury of the present rebellion. To simply extinguish the fire, replace the coal in the cotton and bind up the bale again, would be merely to bring back the same death and desolation which now sweeps over the land in a less period of time, for rags once charred are easy of ignition, and this war will make plentiful tinder. Where a cancer exists it is idle, foolish, vain, to talk of surface applications and temporary plasters; down deep to the root of the disease the knife must go, extirpating the sore, before a radical cure can be hoped for or expected.

There are, in fact, no indications of peace at present, nor is there any immediate necessity for one. The rebellion must be conquered, put down so thoroughly and so hopelessly as to give it no hope of a resurrection, before we can hail peace as a blessing. Civil war is deplorable enough, in all conscience. Had the dire evils that follow in its train been properly appreciated in the outset, it is probable that our nation would have been spared its occurrence. But it brings a certain balm with its sweeping wings, enabling us, from the very nettle of the present desolation, to pluck the flower of safety. Nullification has been experimented upon, and disastrously—future States will have the blazing light of the past to warn them before attempting it. Were the war to cease to-day, even with an acknowledgement of the independence of the South, Maine, Maryland, New York, Illinois, would never dream of secession; what remained of the Union would be bound together by clamps of iron, shrunk to their place in the red heat of this fierce war; what remained of the Union would be henceforward and forever a unit, and Republican Government would have been vindicated throughout all history.

We predict that peace will be heralded by news more important than that one of the Blairs has packed up his carpet-bag and started for Richmond, or that Horace Greeley's white hat has been seen bobbing about President Lincoln's ears. The crumbling of Richmond's walls, and the indignant wail of a people incited to a vain and disastrous rebellion by the false and foolish representations of wicked leaders, will be the first harbingers of peace that reach our ears. Peace will work itself out in its own good time, and there is no use in attempting to hasten the process. Grant, Sherman, and Porter, are dealing sturdy blows at the outer walls of the already trembling fabric, and Jefferson Davis is doing us excellent work within—that between them all it must come down is as certain as that the leaves of spring will be shaken from the trees in autumn. Dissatisfaction with its leader the South already is; dissatisfaction with the cause which he represents will follow in natural progression as the next step, and an abandonment of both will be the sure result. Let us patiently wait; a leaven of wondrous power is working in the dough of rebellion, and we can well afford to bide our time.

TO THE EASTERN PRESS.—Taking it for granted that the Atlantic coast has literature enough of its own without appropriating what is Californian, we must request that in copying original articles from this paper they will at least give the customary credit. Our eastern exchanges seldom reach us without bringing, taken bodily from these columns and without a word of acknowledgment, prose articles and poems which in many cases are reprinted by journals here and sometimes the credit given to the Eastern paper in which they are found. "Emilie Lawson" and "Ina," pre-eminently the poetesses of this coast, as well as "Mark Twain," have been frequent sufferers by this practice. The New York Leader has done so much in that way that we long to take "Figaro" by the fingers and say to him: "Figaro, you are faulty!"

A MUSICAL JOURNAL.—We notice by a paragraph going the rounds of the press that C. B. Seymour, long the musical and dramatic critic of the New York Daily Times, is to become associated in the conduct of a musical journal in that city. An accomplished gentleman, a practiced writer, and an able critic, Mr. Seymour brings every requisite of success to his undertaking. Some years since he established a musical journal in New York, which speedily became known for its reliable musical criticisms and interesting compilations, as well as for the original music which it published. For awhile it flourished, but the bad days came and it went under. We trust that in the present instance Mr. Seymour's success will continue to the end.

NEW YORK LETTER.

[FROM THE CALIFORNIAN'S LADY CORRESPONDENT.]

NEW YORK, December 23d, 1864.

CHRISTMAS Presents on the brain is the raging epidemic. The best families do not hesitate to perambulate our streets with paper parcels and mysterious but affable countenances. So many of these parcels are hid in closets and drawers in every house, that a continuous petard effect is produced in every bosom from the screaming warning of "Don't go there!" Properly enough in this annual overflow of the Gift tide, Noah's Ark is foremost among the toys. The familiar, uneven-legged animals issue from the glued tabernacle under the supervision of Shem and Ham who are dressed in the rigid red and blue night gowns we old ones recollect so well. The army of dancing Jacks is also in motion; ten thousand drums stand ready to be beaten by childish hands for their march—as uncertain a one as the prolonged march of the Jacks who have been on the way to Richmond so long. Indian rubber toys with a pre-Adamite element "vulcanized into their substance," cry to the little child in leggings, and with a little muff tied round its helpless neck, "Buy us, and we'll make you laugh hysterically by day, and dream by night."

With the host of time honored presents comes a legion of elegant sophistications manufactured in the old world which are intended to make the infant a Sardanapalus. I know a little girl of five who has already been demoralized with sets of rosewood and brocade furniture, sets of finely painted china, small scissors, gilt mirrors, and dolls' embroidered wardrobes. This year her mother has in store for her a Yankee cooking stove including a washboiler, in the hope, perhaps, of bringing her tastes back to a primitive simplicity.

The shops this week have been crowded of afternoons. As each day waned, I noticed in my perambulations the shoppers seemed to grow desperate, and, like gamblers, determined to stake their last dollar by sunset. Women are always rude to each other when strangers, and in public. Clerks and counters have witnessed many an ill-bred scene of late. The chintilly veils, the miuk furs, the embroidered balmorals, have hustled each other unmercifully, and the wearers thereof have cut into each others speeches regardless of the rules of politeness. To be fair, I confess I am one of the guilty race. Unabashed as De Foe in the stocks, I asked three times for shilling handkerchiefs in the very teeth of the bloated aristocrats who were turning over those insults to the nose, which consist of a small circle of cambric edged with lace. Like old king Cole, the nose, at this season, is a merry old soul, and calls for goodly squeezes of linen and silk, and, in remote districts, the red white and blue cotton flag known to our ancestors, but now mostly degraded to an office which names it the "bundle handkerchief." To continue with Presents. Like other institutions long established, the system of conferring gifts at Christmas has its objections. The giver is often obliged to bestow where he has no heart for bestowing. Disagreeable relations, deceitful friends, abominable servants, wait to be honored by the custom, and there is no escaping it. Then there is the horror of not being up to the mark in value, and taste, where presents are exchanged between friends of equal means. Fancy the humiliation of receiving a pair of diamond ear-rings in return for a small bronze leather needle-book badly made! How painful, too, is the knowledge which comes to us on Christmas Eve, when our labors are over. With watching and managing, we have contrived to abstract an old friend's old slipper, and have had a new pair made for him. Under the green wood tree we behold a bivouac of slippers, and are informed that "John's wife's sister worked him a pair; also his great aunt, and his nephew's wife; also his fourth cousin who lives at a great distance." You have made a velvet smoking-cap for John, possibly, with a gold tassel—and it is no joke to buy gold tassels now-a-days—and when you present it, his wife says with an indifferent laugh that "John has three that have never been taken out of their first silver paper wrappings." In spite of all this, however, this period of the year is the only genuine holiday time of our people. Thanksgiving is a combination of the pious prig and the gormandizer; Fourth of July is gunpowder, heat fatigue, and an indifferent star and stripe sentiment. But Christmas, with its "Christ child," and its motto of "Peace on earth, good will to man," will always be a happy music in our hearts.

I believe stingy people are moved on this occasion to an extraordinary degree. I do not see any family that is not engaged in the business of preparing gifts. I, myself, somewhat of a lone body, destined to endure the slow perpetual torments of a boarding-house life, am invited to the lighting up of Christmas trees here and there, and to rejoice in the hum of childish voices and the wassail of Christmas punch. Alas! alas! one little voice I heard carolling round the laden branches of the trees of former years, has left me, to sing with the "Christ child," forever; and I have not much heart for the new voices.

The other illustrated magazine, Our Young Folks, starts appropriately at this time. The only evidence of bad taste in it is the placing of the portrait of "Tom Brown" (Hughes) in the frontispiece. It shows an intention on the part of Ticknor & Fields to use up their old plates; there appears to be no other reason for exhibiting the likeness of a writer who has furnished nothing for the magazine. "Tom Brown," by the way, is an author in luck. He is a Colonel of volunteers, and has a place in the war office worth five thousand dollars a year.

While speaking of Christmas and books, it is well enough to note what our publishers have done this year. A legion of the primer style of book has been issued by Sheldon & Co., Hurd & Houghton and others; the primers are dignified by brilliant colors and capital engravings. Our friend, "Jack, the Giant Killer," whom we now need at the head of the National army, has several illustrated biographies. I am sure that if I could have seen the amount of decorated knowledge, when I was young, which is offered to children now, I should be far more wise than I have proved to be from the tuition of my board spelling book, with its obscure, dingy, moral illustrations. Gregory has outdone all publishers in illustrated books. The story of Little Red Riding Hood, told in verse by R. H. Stoddard, contains illustrations, printed in colors, which are the most brilliant specimens of the art yet produced. The Snow Image, by Hawthorne, is also illustrated, together with A Visit from St. Nicholas, The Boys' Banner Book, and Illustrated Book of Songs. These books have unique, beautiful paper covers, which are attractive to the amount of the prices of the whole books. A couple of capital books of Hurd & Houghton's must not be passed by: The Frog he would a Wooing Go, and Death and Burial of Cock Robin. The designs are by Stephens, of the late Vanity Fair newspaper, and though the idea is taken from that renowned book, The Comical People of Wirtemberg, they are executed with so much spirit and cleverness that they fairly rival the original. Giving animals human attributes, and dressing them in human garments, was a happy thought, if the word "happy" can be applied to the grotesque, absurd and impossible. Edmund Sear's well-known Book of Nonsense is also imitated in a couple of little books, Ye Comical Rhymes of Ancient Times, and Rumrical Rhymes. They are printed in red and black letters, and the illustrations are in red and black.

A box system of books has been created within two or three years, each box containing four, six or eight volumes. A writer named "Aunt Fanny" is particularly given to this sort of thing. First we had a box of Night Caps, then one of Mittens, after that came one of Socks, and now a box of Pop Guns is discharged at the public. The Little Blue Hood Books, consisting of four red bound volumes, make up a nice gift box, and the Walter Gay series is another. The books that I have mentioned are children's books, so called; but many of them are above the comprehension of a child. The half of the Christmas books are not touched upon. Ticknor & Fields, Crosby & Nichols, J. E. Tilton and Roberts Brothers, of Boston, all have issues.

Our latest traveller from Britain, Professor Goodwin Smith, has sailed for his native isle. He attached himself to the Loyal League while here exclusively, and, of course, will be able to state all sides fairly when he lectures on the political aspects of our country. He gave a pretty strong proof of his knowledge of American History when he complimented New England, before a Boston audience, for having produced a Patrick Henry and a Washington! It is well, probably, that English tourists should relieve each other in see-sawing us. George Augustus Sala was bumping the ground when he departed from our coast, the other day, at the time when professor Smith was high up in the air of Boston. The only remarkable Indian historian is dead—Mr. Schoolcraft. His productions were authentic, if anything concerning that myth, the "noble savage," may be called authentic. Dryden, by the way, is the man to blame for the misnomer, he has a heroic line which runs this wise:

"When wild in woods the noble savage ran."

Longfellow spoiled one of Schoolcraft's stories by turning it into that curious, not over good "Hiawatha."

The Trunpy-Demme case known to all the world, has come to a Germanesque conclusion, that reminds one of "The Sorrows of Werther," which convulsed the world more than any real tragedy ever did. There is an astonishing simplicity in the following letter:

"To Friends and Acquaintances.—The startling intelligence has reached us that, in accordance with a farewell letter, Dr. Hermann Demme and his bride Flora, allied in faithful love, have sought and found a common grave in the depths of the Lake of Geneva. May enmity be struck dumb at this news, but friendship offer silent sympathy to our sorrow.

THE DEMME FAMILY."

If there was more of this naïveté in our catastrophes, they would make better materials for the penny-a-liners who are generally compelled to write brutally. E. D. B. S.

THE TARTAR WHO CAUGHT A TARTAR.

A HUNGARIAN LEGEND.

THERE'S trouble in Hungary, now, alas!

There's trouble on every hand;
For that terrible man,
The Tartar Khan,
Is ravaging over the land!

He is riding forth with his ugly men,
To rob and ravish and slay;
For deeds like those,
You may well suppose,
Are quite in the Tartar-way.

And now he comes, that terrible chief,
To a mansion grand and old:
And he peers about,
Within and without,
And what do his eyes behold?

A thousand cattle in fold and field,
And sheep all over the plain,
And noble steeds,
Of rarest breeds,
And beautiful crops of grain.

But finer still is the hoarded wealth
That his ravished eyes behold,
In silver plate
Of wondrous weight,
And jewels of pearl and gold!

A nobleman owns this fine estate:
And when the robber he sees,
'Tis not very queer
He quakes with fear,
And trembles a bit in the knees!

He quakes in fear of his precious life,
And scarce suppressing a groan,
"Good Tartar," says he,
"Whatever you see
Be pleased to reckon your own!"

The Khan looked round in a leisurely way
As one who is puzzled to choose;
When, cocking his ear,
He chanced to hear
The creak of feminine shoes!

The Tartar smiled a villainous smile,
When, like a lily in bloom,
A lady fair
With golden hair,
Came gliding into the room!

The robber stared with amorous eyes;
Was ever so winning a face!
And long he gazed
As one amazed
To see such beauty and grace!

A moment more, and the lawless man
Had seized his struggling prey,
Without remorse,
And—taking horse—
He bore the lady away!

"Now, Heaven be praised!" the nobleman cried,
"For many a mercy to me!
I bow me still
Unto his will.
God pity the Tartar!" said he.

[From a new book of Poems, "Clever Stories of Many Nations, rendered into Rhyme," by John G. Saxe.]

Too FUNNY.—The Mercury of last week says: "Speaking of funny things, just read 'The Course of True Love,' etc., on the third page of to-day's Mercury." It is a funny thing, indeed; written by Mark Twain, and paid for and published in THE CALIFORNIAN, the article, after going the rounds of the Eastern press is republished here without a word of credit to either. Did it not occur to us that the mistake may be an honest one, we would remark that in this instance the name of "Mercury" suggests itself as being peculiarly appropriate.

ANSWERED.—A correspondent of the Bulletin writes to it on Tuesday evening, making inquiry relative to an article in a previous issue, headed, "Where is the Leak?" Had he but waited a day, his curiosity would have been gratified, for that paper in its issue of Wednesday introduces a sub-head in its New York letter as follows: "THE CANADIAN AUTHORITIES EATING THE LEEK."

Mrs. Grantley, who has lately been giving dramatic readings through Nevada, will make her début in Knowles' drama of The Wife, at the Opera House, in the interregnum between the conclusion of the Keans' engagement and the commencement of the Heron's—who is already on the wing. The lady bears a striking resemblance to Mrs. Julia Dean Hayne in face and figure, and if the likeness extend to dramatic ability, a triumph may confidently be anticipated for her.

PETROLEUM PICKINGS.—A gentleman especially familiar with Shakspeare, and who has probably been "taking liberties" with stock in some of the various oil wells or petroleum speculations, strings together the following pungent quotations as germane to his present feelings. He is of opinion that a petroleum mine is peculiarly a "mine of well-th," and declares that the new oil-garchy thus introduced into our social system beats the old-style aristocracy "oil hollow." He insists that a "sinking fund" is necessary to go into the business, and that petroleum is the real huile of fortune. Then he affects to quote from Byron:

The oils of Greece! the oils of Greece!

After which he thus Shakspearianizes a la Weller:

SHAKSPEARE ON PETROLEUM.

A well-disposed person on his first introduction:

I am glad to see you well.—Hamlet.

The discoverer exclaims:

I have a device to make oil well.—Midsummer Night's Dream.

A disappointed purchaser:

This is not so well as I looked for.—Love's Labor Lost.

Selling stocks:

None so bad but well may be reported.—Henry VIII.

An owner of an unprofitable well:

I am not so well as I should be.—Cymbeline.Well or ill, I am bound to thee.—Ibid.One that loved not wisely, but two wells.—Othello.

Leaving the business:

Well, peace be with you.—Romeo and Juliet.I know thee, well enough.—King Lear.

A lady speculator:

She's a wondrous fat marriage.—Comedy of Errors.I'll do! I'll do! I'll do!—Macbeth.

A lucky speculator:

Well contented.—Ibid.

Sweep on, you fat and greasy citizens,

'Tis just the fashion.—As You Like It.I say, by soeery be got this isle.—Tempest.This isle is full of noises.—Ibid.

I like thee well,

And will employ thee in some service presently.

[Two Gentlemen of Verona.

For a charm of powerful trouble,

Like a hell-broth, b-oil and bubble.—Macbeth.

A STRANGE STORY.—A truly melodramatic anecdote is in circulation in Paris, which must be accepted without notarial vouching, but still as indorsed by being given to the world by those who are not ordinarily bravards. A Russian nobleman, extremely wealthy, and very reserved and melancholy, has appeared of late in the best circles, to which he has had most distinguished introducers. The Russian became remarkable for wearing a ring of colossal proportions, covering nearly the entire finger, and of singular appearance, the centre being composed of a substance resembling jet, which was set in gold. No one ventured to ask the character of the ring or the cause of its being worn, and placing the wearer, a studiously quiet man, in the light of being an eccentric individual. A lady, however, who was piqued to know something about the matter, at last mustered the requisite courage, and said, "Monsieur, every one is very much struck with the singular character of the ring you wear, and I for one should be delighted to know its origin." The Russian made a nervous twitch with his hand, as though he would like to hide it, while he replied, "Madame, the ring is not a jewel, as you suppose, but a tomb." The curious gathered round while he continued: "This jet substance is the body of my wife; she had a horror of a tomb in Russia; she was Italian. I promised her that I would guard her day and night during my life, and she reposed in my word, which had never been broken. I took the body of my wife to Germany, where the most able chemist of the day promised to reduce it, by powerful solvents and by great compression, to a size which would enable me to wear it as a souvenir. For eight days he labored almost constantly in my presence, and I saw the dear remains gradually dissolve and intensify till the residue was the compact mass which you see in the ring, which is my dear wife, who, as I promised, I will never quit day or night during my life."

HE FORGOT SOMETHING.—"What did your mother say, my little man? Did you give her my card?" asked an inexperienced young gentleman of a little boy whose mother had given him an invitation to call upon her, and whose street door was accordingly opened to his untimely summons by the urchin aforesaid. "Yes," I gave it to her," was the innocent reply, "and she said if you wasn't a nat'ral fool, you wouldn't come Monday morning, when everybody was washing!" At this juncture, mamma, with a sweet smile of welcome, made her appearance at the end of the hall, when, to her surprise, Mr. Verisoph, the visitor, bolted. "What does the man mean?" inquired mamma, "I dunno," replied bub, "guess he's forgot sumthin."

THE TWO P's.—The Weekly Dispatch, in zeal for our reformation, invites us not to spell "developed" with more than one p. Appreciating the kindness of the motive, and the classic grace with which it is pleaded in our neighbor's columns, we must decline to comply with his request. We require other authority than that of Webster or Worcester, ere we give way to the practice of abolishing summarily the double consonant in the participle of a verb that terminates with one consonant. Webster, at our elbow, it is to be remarked, spells the verb without the vowel e at the end, though this latter fantasy is also creeping into use. This is our distinction. The woodman who lops the boughs is lopping, though the hills which slope are sloping. The birds thereon may be hopping about, and we meanwhile hoping that we are correct. The peacock that struts is strutting, not strutting. Instances of the difference are plenteous; but we don't care to be dinning the subject into our readers, lest it spoil their pleasure in dining.—N. Y. Albion.

ORIGIN OF THE "PRINTER'S DEVIL."—When Manutius the elder set up in business, at Venice, he came in possession of a little negro boy. This boy was known over the city as "the little black devil" who helped the mysterious bibliofactor along, and some of the ignorant persons believed him to be none other than the embodiment of Satan, who helped Aldus in the prosecution of his profession. One day, Aldus, to dispel this strange hallucination by publicity, displayed the young imp to the poorer classes. Upon the occasion he made a very characteristic speech: "Let it be known in Venice that I, Aldus Manutius, printer to the Holy Church and Doge, have this day made public exposure of the printer's devil. All those who think he is not flesh and blood may come and pinch him."

"DOMESTIC RECEIPTS IN FULL."—Tew serve up cowcumber—pick them when the dew is on 'em neatly, slice them thin, add salt and let them stand for 60 minits, pepper them freely, add good sharp vinegar, and then—raise the window carefully and throw them out.

Tew make watermelons the old-fashioned wa—steal them by moonlight, and eat them in the next lot.

GRANTLEY BERKELEY is thus mentioned in a London letter to the New York Times: "That octogenarian dandy, Hon. Grantley Berkeley, whose sporting visit to the Western States a few years ago brought him into notice in this country, has just published an autobiography which gives a curious insight into the habits and associations of the British aristocracy. In its earliest pages he does not scruple to let his readers know that his mother was a petty tradesman's daughter, and that she was his father's mistress, under the name of Miss Tudor. From his description it would appear that she was vulgar and unfeeling, and that his father, by his brutality, was worthy of matching with her. The facts related in connection with his duel with Dr. Maginn exhibit in a still more shameless light the character of the writer. He does his utmost to show that Maginn was a coward, and that Mr. Fraser had instigated him to shoot his opponent under threat of arrest for debt if he failed."

"ONE might—one now and then can," says John Foster in his Diary, "throw one's whole soul through one's eyes in a single glance." Great men, especially great commanders, generally possess this remarkable power, which, like every other bodily or spiritual faculty, becomes all the stronger from its frequent use. "In the eyes of certain persons there is something sublime, which beams and exacts reverence. This sublimity is the concealed power of raising themselves above others, which is not the wretched effect of constraint, but primitive essence. Each one finds himself obliged to submit to this secret power, without knowing why, as he perceives that look, implanted by nature to inspire reverence, shining in the eye. Those who possess this natural sovereign essence rule as lords or lions among men by native privilege, with heart and tongue conquering all."

AN elephant and bull fight took place lately at Saragossa, Spain. The elephant was walking quietly about the arena when the first bull was released, and rushed at it with all his might. The elephant received his antagonist with great coolness, and threw him down with the utmost ease. The bull rose again and made two more attacks, which the elephant repented by killing him with a thrust of his tusks. The conqueror did not seem in the least excited, but quietly drank some water offered by his keeper, and ate several ears of Indian corn. A second bull was then released, and, in a few minutes, suffered the same fate as the first.

THOSE who think awry will not be likely to act straightly.

TO ———.

THE broken moon lay in the autumn sky,
And I lay at thy feet;
You bent above me; in the silence I
Could hear my wild heart beat.

I spoke; my soul was full of trembling fears
At what my words would bring:
You raised your face, your eyes were full of tears,
As the sweet eyes of Spring.

You kissed me then, I worshipped at thy feet
Upon the shadowy sod.
O fool, I loved thee! loved thee, lovely cheat!
Better than Fame or God.

My soul leaped up beneath thy timid kiss:
What then to me were groans,
Or pain, or death? Earth was a round of bliss,
I seemed to walk on thrones.

And you were with me 'mong the rushing wheels,
'Mid Trade's tumultuous jars;
And where to awe-struck wilds the Night reveals
Her hollow gulfs of stars.

Before your window, as before a shrine,
I've knelt 'mong dew-soaked flowers,
While distant music-bells, with voices fine,
Measured the midnight hours.

There came a fearful moment: I was pale,
You wept, and never spoke,
But clung around me as the woodhine frail
Clings, pleading, round an oak.

Upon my wrong I steadied up my soul,
And flung thee from myself;
I spurned thy love as 't were a rich man's dole—
It was my only wealth.

I spurned thee! I, who loved thee, could have died,
That hoped to call thee "wife,"
And bear thee, gently smiling at my side,
Through all the shocks of life!

Too late, thy fatal beauty and thy tears,
Thy vows, thy passionate breath;
I'll meet thee not in Life, nor in the spheres
Made visible by Death. [Alexander Smith.]

CHAPTER XII.

A MODERN GENTLEMAN'S DIARY.

FRANCIS TREDETHLYN went back to the hotel in Convent Garden with the little sheepskin-covered volume appertaining to the gentleman who called himself Robert Lesley safely bestowed in his pocket. He went straight back to the hotel, ate his simple dinner, drew the candles near him, and then, taking up a poker from the hearth, made short work of the lock under which the stranger had kept his secrets. All thought of those sunny gardeus and drawing-rooms at Twickenham, the glancing river, the woody background, faded out of his mind for a time, and gave place to one settled purpose—the discovery of his missing cousin's destroyer.

Yes, her destroyer! He had only been able to read Mrs. Burfield's story in one fashion. The solitary departure in the chill light of a winter's morning, the haste and secrecy, the lonely return long afterwards—these things seemed to the young man to point only to one conclusion. The simple Cornish girl's faith had been betrayed by the man she had so implicitly trusted.

In the little volume before him Francis Tredethlyn hoped to find some further clue to that sad history. He seemed to take a savage pleasure in punishing the neat brazen lock, which he shattered with a couple of vigorous blows from the handle of the poker.

"I wonder whether, when a man's a villain, he writes that down?" thought Mr. Tredethlyn. "I can't fancy a scoundrel putting the truth about himself even on paper; and if the truth isn't here, I can't see how the book will help me. And yet there must be secrets in it too, or he'd never have had such a lock as this. Mr. Lowther used to throw his journal about anywhere, and I don't think he ever did anything that was particularly worth writing down."

The Cornishman began to turn over the volume very slowly, looking at the pages cautiously, almost as if he expected to see some venomous creature crawl out from between the leaves. The first twenty pages of the book were filled with the records of a college life, in which brief memoranda of study were interspersed with boating slang and turf calculations. The name of a certain Rosa, of the "King's Head," appeared very often in these earlier pages; and there were little epigrams about Rosa, bespeaking the easy-going morality of a Rochester or a Sedley, rather than the pure sentiments of a Tennyson or a Longfellow. Altogether there was a reckless, swaggering manner about the book, which very well corresponded with Mrs. Burfield's description of the prancing stranger.

But the volume had no interest for Francis Tredethlyn until he came to the twentieth page, where the name of Coltonslough figured for the first time:

"November 8.—The abomination of desolation, and just the place for a fellow that wants to read hard and be delivered from the society of his fellow-creatures! Arrived yesterday afternoon; found civil landlady, stereotyped sea-side accommodation; decrepit easy-chair, slippery horse-hair cushions; no window curtains to speak of, and a great deal of unnecessary drapery festooned about a rickety tent bedstead: wash-handstand one size too large for a doll, and fifty sizes too small for any civilized being; shells and shepherdesses on the mantelpieces, and any amount of blown-glass decanters on the sideboard. Dined on chops, which were fried, soddened in their own grease. Must speak to the landlady to-morrow, and insist on gridiron. The woman who would fry chops would think nothing of human sacrifices. A girl waited upon me, a good deal younger than Rosa, and I think prettier—but we have changed all that, so I didn't take particular notice of her. Read hard till after one, and write this before retiring to my couch—flock, and lumpy—for I dug my knuckles into the counterpane while examining the apartment.

"November 9.—The girl, who is infinitely superior to Rosa, brought me my breakfast. More chops, not fried, but soddened in relic of the dark ages entitled Dutch oven, for lincured; and underdone French rolls. Why, O provincial baker, always underdone? What grudge dost thou bear against thy fellow-man that thou seekest insidiously to undermine his constitution with thy clammy bread-stuffs? Girl, infinitely prettier than Rosa, cleared away breakfast. Very shy, and only answers polite inquiries in monosyllables. Asked if she was a relation of woman of house. No, no relation, nursery governess to children. Comes from some remote district in the west of England; evidently objects to be precise as to locality. Heard her go down kitchen stairs with tea-things, and did not hear her reascending them. Conclude that the nursery is somewhere in the cellarage. Read hard all day. Smoke and stroll in the evening. Landlady waited on me at dinner. Dismal change, after monosyllabic girl, recalling Death's head at Egyptian banquets, but not crowned with flowers. More reading after dinner, brandy and water, cold and now to bed. Have ordered mattress to be put over flock. Sleeping on knobby surface all very well now and then, but not for a permanence. Menu: To keep my eye upon Lord Paisley's Blazing Tom, for the Craven meeting.

"November 12.—No diary yesterday or the day before. Read with German crib—wonderful fellows those Germans for first-class translations of classic fogies. Wrote to H. C. to put a pony on Blazing Tom. Walked on the esplanade in the afternoon, and made the acquaintance of monosyllabic Cornish girl, infinitely prettier than Rosa. Yes, I succeeded in breaking the ice, with considerable trouble, for I never did see anything feminine so shy and lightened as this brown-eyed Cornish girl. 'Her eye's dark charn,' etc. Well, there is something of the gazelle in her eyes, something shrinking and fawn-like. I could fancy the white doo of what's-its-name looking as she looked at me yesterday.

"I went out for my smoke and stroll rather earlier than I had intended. I saw the Cornish girl and three uncouth children in rusty leather boots, wending their way across the piece of waste ground which forms the delicious prospect before my window. A nice, cool, gray afternoon, with a low yellow streak on the western horizon; a gray sea, melting into a gray sky, with only just that one golden streak glimmering along the edge of the waters; the sort of afternoon that reminds one of Tennyson's poetry. So I lighted my cigar and went out for a stroll. Perhaps I followed the monosyllabic girl. What do I know? as that amiable French uisancee, who is perpetually quoted in newspaper leaders, remarked. Enough that I went, found the Cornish girl, very shabbily dressed, but unutterably pretty, strolling listlessly up and down the paved walk beside the sea. They call it sea, but O for the roaring breakers of the Atlantic, or the long hoarse roar of the waves, as the German Ocean surges on broad yellow sands yonder, far away in the north!

"And so, having lighted my cigar, I strolled up and down the esplanade. Of course I began to talk to the children. If children have any use in this world, which I have been frequently inclined to doubt, surely it must be in this matter of serving as a means of introduction to pretty nurse-maids. The children and I were intimate no time; the presuming little imps became, of course, obnoxiously familiar; and, like all go-betweens, were very difficult to shake off when done with. But I got the Cornish girl to talk at last. She is not stupid, only shy; and she told me a good deal, in a pretty, simple, girlish way, about her native county, always keeping clear of all precise allusion to locality, by-the-by. She is very pretty—I had almost written lovely, but that adjective can only be applied to a high-bred beauty. She is extremely pretty, and that white doe of Rhylston (isn't it?) look in her eyes haunted me all last night while I was reading. Yes, it was very pleasant, that stroll upon the esplanade. I threw away my first cigar, and forgot to light another, though she would have allowed me to smoke, I dare say. It was very pleasant, that cool gray sea, and the yellow streak fading in the west, and the flat gray shore, and the generally Tennysonian aspect of everything. It was very much better than the 'King's Arms,' and a lot of fellows drinking no end of Bass and chaffing Rosa. I don't suppose this Cornish girl knows what chaff means. I almost shudder when I think of Rosa, with her big, round, black eyes, and the sticky little curls upon her forehead, and the tartan neck ribbons, and great yellow ear-rings. And Oxonians have married Rosa before my time, and have deservedly gone to the dogs thereupon. But fifty thousand is your figure, my dear Robert, fifty thousand, well sounded, and no separate use and maintenance humbug either. Something in the commercial widow line, I suppose you will have to put up with, my poor Bob, but no greedy old parent to interfere with the disposal of the money. The widow, or the orphan, if a fifty thousand pounder, is the sort of article for you, dear child.

"November 13.—She brought me my breakfast this morning—(what, is she she already? Alas, poor Rosa!)—and I got her to pour out my tea. I couldn't detain her long: she was so very busy, she said, and seemed painfully anxious to get away. I made her talk a little. She has a nice low voice—'an excellent thing,' etc.? Now Rosa had a vixenish way of speaking that always jarred upon me, even when I was deepest down that pit into which the fair barmaid's admirers cast themselves. She—the Cornish girl—is what people call a genteel young person, with white hands and a slim waist, and a nice way of doing her hair and putting on her collars and cuffs. Her name is Susan Turner, by-the-by, and the children call her Susie. Could anything sound more pastoral? Susie. The name of Rosa was always so painfully suggestive of nigger melodies. Another cool gray afternoon, and another yellow line across the sky, so I went out for my smoke at the same time as yesterday. She was on the esplanade with the children. She instructs them in arithmetic, writing, and elementary smatterings of history, geography, and grammar, after dinner, and then brings them out for a walk till tea-time, after which they 'retire to rest,' as the novelists have it, not without considerable rebellious scuffling in the passage and on the stairs. That is the order of the day. In the morning, I suspect, she is housemaid, parlor-maid, needlewoman, or anything else that my landlady's necessities oblige her to be. But she is always equally neat and pretty, and if she were only provided with that trifling little matter of fifty thousand or so in the elegant simplicity of the three per cents., I should be decidedly inclined to fall in love with her. Does one ever fall in love with the fifty thousand pounder, by-the-by? I rather think not. She, Susie, was not quite so shy this afternoon, and we talked a good deal. I offered to lend her some books. I offered to lend Rosa books once, when I was in the lowest depths of spooneyism, and was unhappy about her grammar—those dreadful, superfluous 'whiches,' and intolerable 'as hows!'—but Rosa rejected my literature as dry rubbish that gave her the horrors. I had lent her the Bride of Lammermoor. My little Susie won't turn up that innocent nose of hers at any sentimental story, I'll be bound. I found an odd volume of Byron, containing 'Parasina' and the 'Prisoner of Chillon,' and a lot of the To Thyraz business.

"N. B.—I find that I've called her my little Susie! Pretty well, as I've been only a week in the place. Am I going down into another pit, I wonder—a deeper abyss than that into which Rosa casts her victims? Poor, pretty, fawn-eyed little darling! Take care of yourself, my dear Robert. Poor, friendless Susie! She couldn't well be worse off under any circumstances than she is in this place, that's one blessing: the drudge of a mistress who is herself a slave in the bondage of poverty. I went down to the kitchen yesterday to get a fresh supply of coals—these people are ready to fall down and worship me because I am not proud, as they put it, but there are numerous orders of pride, I think—and I saw their dinner. Such a poor bone of mutton. Poor little Susie! how she would open her eyes at sight of the Richmond and Greenwich banquets that I have seen given to persons as inferior to herself as—Hyperion to the other person;—what a frightful hindrance to original composition is that abominable habit of hackneyed quotation!—the great newspaper mill going round three hundred and thirteen times a year, and only one little limited stock of quotations for all the leader writers.

"November 16.—Sunday, and a wet day; saw Susan start for church in the morning with prayer-books and children; strolled out with umbrella a little after twelve; found church; unpleasant new building, smelling of damp stucco, and looking like an edifice of soddened brown paper; waited in the porch, patient as that young idiot in Arthur Pendennis's poem, until my lady came out, and conducted her home in triumph under my umbrella, while the awkward squad of children brought up the rear under cover of the maternal gingham; she was obliged to take my arm, and as the walk from the church is rather a long one, we got alarmingly intimate; when I say alarmingly intimate, I mean that she has taken to blushing when I speak to her. That's the worst of these fawn-like girls, they will blush! And when they're pretty, the blushes are so bewitching. And when they don't happen to have fifty thousand or so, what is a fellow to do? Take to his heels, replies the stern moralist, who has sown his own wild oats twenty years ago, and is envious of the young scatterers of to-day. I came to Coltonslough to read, and come what may, I shall stay there till it's time to go back to St. B. In the mean time, Susan is a brown-eyed angel, an angel who leads the life of a low-bred drudge, and for whom any possible change of circumstances must be a change for the better.

"Of course I questioned her about the sermon as we walked home. Take an interest in sermons, and women will believe in you though you were the veriest scoundrel that ever admired Voltaire and considered the 'Pucelle' his chef d'œuvre. What a little Puritan she is! she has been to church twice every Sunday ever since she can remember, she told me, and to Sunday school, and to all kinds of examinations in the Vicar's parlor. I don't suppose she would have floundered as I did, and come to grief over some of the questions those old fogies at Oxford asked me about Biblical history; she knows all about Saul, and David, and Jonathan, and those everlasting wars with the Philistines, I dare say; she is very pretty, lovely—yes, lovely, although not high-bred. I sometimes fancy, though, that she must have decent blood in her veins. I never saw a prettier little hand upon my arm than that which rested there to-day, as I brought her home from church. If I were—something utterly different from what I am, I would get my degree, go in for a country curacy, and little Susie should be my wife. But noblesse oblige: which very elastic aphorism means, in my case, that I must marry a rich woman, and hold my own in my native county whenever the reigning potentate is polite enough to retire to the dusky shades whither all earthly sovereigns must go.

"Poor little Susan! pretty little Susan! When I am a county magnate, laying down the law at the head of my table in the great dining-room at the hall, shall I look back and think of these days, and smile at myself, remembering that I could be so foolish as to go out on a wet Sunday to escort a little nursemaid along a damp clay road?

"Read hard all the afternoon; dined on an elderly fowl flavored with Dutch oven, a bird that must have known Coltonslough when the first bow-windowed house was a damp brick-work skeleton, grim and open to the howling of the winds. Read for some time after dinner, and let my fire out. Went down-stairs to hunt up matches and firewood, and found my landlady and Susan sitting opposite to each other at a little table with one tallow candle, reading pious compositions of an evangelical tendency. They both seemed glad to see me, so I stopped and talked to them. Susan had read the 'Prisoner of Chillon'; she read it last night, and cried over it 'fearful,' my landlady informed me; so we were able to talk about the poem, and I read two or three of the fugitive pieces aloud. I used to be rather great at the debating club at O—, and I gave the 'Thyrsas' and 'Day of my Destiny' is very strong. I could see the tears shining in Susan's eyes before I'd finished. I used to recite poetry to Rosa sometimes, when I'd been taking too much Bass, and we stood in the moonlit porch at the 'King's Arms,' with the river, and the willows, and the towing-path all of a shimmer in the silvery light; but one is apt to get tired of reciting sentimental poetry to a young person who cries, 'Lor, how funny!' at the close of some passionate verse. I remember thundering out that grand anathema of Tom Moore's against the Prince Regent, 'Go, deceiver, go!' and my Rosa asked me, naively, what the gentleman had done that the other gentleman should use such bad language to him. No, Rosa, your strong point was not intellect. In the matter of sticky curls and large black eyes you are unsurpassed, but the sentimental element in your nature may be represented by zero.

"November 30.—More blanks in my journal. I said we were growing alarmingly intimate; such an intimacy is alarming to a fellow who came to Coltonslough bent on devoting himself to Aristotle and Aristophanes, Æschylus and Euripides, and all that sort of people. Have been reading 'The Clouds' all this morning, but found a strange undercurrent of Susan Turner pervading that classic satire; and I mean to go in and win this time; those fellows at St. Boniface sha'n't be able to laugh at my discomfiture a second time. Why were women created for the trouble and confusion of the superior sex? I thought I should be so safe at Coltonslough, remote from Rosa, the Delilah of my youth; and lo! here is another Delilah, a thousand times more dangerous; a shy, brown-eyed Omphale, for whose sake any intellectual Hercules on this earth would meekly hold the distaff. She is so pretty; and all those modest, shrinking ways have such an unspeakable fascination after a long course of Rosa's sharp repartees, all redolent of the bar and the beer engines. I can never dissociate Rosa from the smell of malt liquors and ardent spirits, with just a faint suspicion of lemons and stale pork pie. But there must be something extraordinary about this girl, for her vulgar surroundings do not seem to vulgarize her. I don't mean that she is one of nature's duchesses, or any humbug of that sort. I have no belief in nature's nobility, and to my mind a duchess is a person who has been cradled in Belgravia, whose long clothes were flounced with point d'Aleçon, and to whom the wrong side of Temple Bar would be as strange as the centre of Africa. I should by no means care to see my little Susie in a London drawing-room; but I can fancy her domiciled in some rustic cottage in the lake district, a patient Wordsworthian little handmaiden, waiting upon and worshipping her husband, and getting him cosy breakfasts, with silvery trout broiled to perfection, and mushrooms newly gathered from the neighboring plains. If I were only an embryo curate, with neither expectations nor ambitious desires, I scarcely think that I could find a better wife than this simple gazelle-eyed maiden; but—Oh, that terrible monosyllable! The history of all the world seems made up of buts and ifs.

"My afternoon stroll upon the esplanade has grown into an established thing. Sixpence judiciously bestowed upon the children despatches those young abominations scurrying over the waste ground to an emporium which they call 'the shop,' whence they return after an interval, embrowned and sticky with the traces of gingerbread and barley-sugar. In the mean while, Susan and I are alone on that dreary esplanade. What is it Byron says about youth, and solitude, and the sea? Well, that sort of thing is rather a dangerous combination, and I begin to think that if I want to redeem my character at St. B., I shall be obliged to take myself and my books away from Coltonslough. Breathes there the wretch with soul so dead,' who could sit in that dingy parlor, coaching himself in the classics, while one of the prettiest girls in all the British dominions is walking up and down the esplanade opposite his window, and thinking of him? Yes, she thinks of me, and expects me when that yellow streak begins to glimmer in the west. I have seen her head turned towards my window, and then I pitch my friend Sophocles into the remotest corner, and go out for my afternoon stroll.

MACAIRE AND THE DOG.—A gentleman named Macaire, officer of the body-guard of Charles V., king of France, entertained a bitter hatred against another gentleman, named Aubry de Montdidier, his comrade in service. These two having met in the Forest of Bondis, near Paris, Macaire took an opportunity of treacherously murdering his brother officer, and buried him in a ditch. Montdidier was unaccompanied at the moment, excepting by a greyhound, with which he had probably gone out to hunt. Julius Scaliger, who tells the story, does not mention whether the dog was tied or muzzled, or in what manner the assassin got the deed accomplished without its interference. But, be this as it might, the hound lay down on the grave of its master, and there remained till hunger compelled it to rise. It then went to the kitchen of one of Aubry de Montdidier's dearest friends, where it was welcomed warmly, and fed. As soon as its hunger was appeased, the dog disappeared. For several days this coming and going was repeated, till at last the curiosity of those who saw its movements was excited, and it was resolved to follow the animal, and see if any thing could be learned in explanation of Montdidier's sudden disappearance. The dog was accordingly followed, and was seen to come to a pause on some newly-turned-up earth, where it set up the most mournful wailings and howlings. Scaliger says, that these cries were inexpressibly touching. Those who heard them dug into the ground at the spot, and found there the body of Aubry de Montdidier. It was raised and conveyed to Paris, where it was soon afterwards interred in one of the city cemeteries.

The dog attached itself, from this time forth, to the friend, already mentioned, of its late master. While attending on him, it chanced several times to get a sight of Macaire, and on every occasion it sprang upon him, and would have strangled him had it not been taken off by force. This intensity of hate on the part of the animal awakened a suspicion that Macaire had had some share in Montdidier's murder, for his body showed him to have met a violent death. Charles V., on being informed of the circumstances, wished to satisfy himself of their truth. He made Macaire and the dog be brought before him, and beheld the animal again spring upon the object of its hatred. The king interrogated Macaire closely, but the latter would not admit that he had been in any way connected with Montdidier's murder.

Being strongly impressed by a conviction that the conduct of the dog was based on some guilty act of Macaire, the king ordered a combat to take place between the officer and his dumb accuser, according to the practice, in those days, between human plaintiffs and defendants. This remarkable combat took place on the isle of Notre-Dame at Paris, in presence of the whole court. The king allowed Macaire to have a strong club, as a defensive weapon; while, on the other hand, the only self-preservative means allowed to the dog consisted of a hole or recess, into which it could retreat if hard pressed. The combatants appeared in the lists. The dog seemed perfectly aware of its situation and duty. For a short time it leapt actively around Macaire, and then, at one spring, it fastened itself upon his throat, in so firm a manner that he could not disentangle himself. He would have been strangled had he not cried for mercy, and avowed his crime. The dog was pulled from off him, but he was only liberated from its fangs to perish by the hands of the law. The fidelity of this dog has been celebrated in many a drama and poem. It is usually called the Dog of Montargis, from the combat having taken place at the Chateau of Montargis.

A SPARTAN MARRIAGE.—Many of the laws of Lycurgus, in connection with this subject, would undoubtedly meet with the approbation of the fair sex of modern times. The time for marriage was fixed by statute—that of the man at about 30 or 35 years; that of the lady at about twenty, or a little younger. All men who continued unmarried after the appointed time were liable to prosecution, and all old bachelors were prohibited from being present at the public exercises of the Spartan maidens, and were denied the usual respect and honors paid to old age. "Why should I give you place," cried the young man to the old unmarried gentleman, "when you have no child to give me place when I am old?" No marriage portions were given to any of the maidens, so that neither poverty should prevent a gallant, nor riches tempt him to marry contrary to his inclinations. The parents of three children enjoyed considerable immunities, and those with four children paid no tax whatever—a regulation which all married men with large families will readily admit to be most wise and equitable. Every marriage was preceded by a betrothal, as in other Greek cities, but the marriage itself was performed by the young Spartan carrying off his bride by pretended abduction, and for some time afterward the wife continued to reside with her own family, and only met her husband on stated occasions. This extraordinary way of spending the honeymoon was first introduced by Lycurgus to prevent the husband from wasting too much of his time in his wife's society during the first years of their marriage; and in order to economize the bride's charms, it was customary for her bridesmaid to cut off all her hair on the wedding day, so that for some time, at least, her personal attractions should increase with her years—a very good and commendable plan, which we recommend to the wives of the present day.

EXTRAORDINARY MEMORY.—Seneca says of himself, that by the mere efforts of his natural memory he was able to repeat two thousand words upon once hearing them, each in its order, though they had no dependence or connection with each other. After which he mentioned a friend of his, Pontius Prato, who retained in his memory all the orations he had ever spoken and never found his memory fail him, even in a single word. He also mentioned Cynæas, ambassador to the Romans from King Pyrrhus, who in one day so well learned the names of his spectators, that the next day he saluted the whole Senate, and all the populace assembled, each by his name. Pliny says that Cyrus knew every soldier in his army by name; and L. Scipio all the people of Rome. Herr Von Nieublin, the celebrated German scholar, was once a clerk in the bank of Copenhagen, in which capacity he gave proof of the miraculous power of memory by restoring, from recollection alone, the whole contents of a leaf in the bank ledger which had been lost by fraud or accident.

SOMETHING ABOUT A STEAMBOAT MAN.—The meanness of some of our merchant princes has passed into a proverb, and that of a certain great steamboat man, celebrated also for his taste for fast horses and Hudson and Harlem Railroad stock, is not only a proverb but an axiom. Some time since this party sent one of his clerks to Aspinwall, and as a reward for faithful service deducted the passage money from his salary. About the same time he donated a splendid steamship to the Government of the United States, after he had made out of said Government a half-million of dollars for the use of the very vessel as a transport, to say nothing of the millions secured for the service of other vessels. Lately the climax has been reached. The Government, it is well known, sends a convoy with each of the California steamships on the Atlantic. The orders invariably given by the owner of the line are for his vessels to wait for their convoy. On the last trip of the North Star to this port the gunboat Augusta, her convoy, broke down, and Capt. Jones, of the North Star, towed her into Port Royal. For this he has been discharged, his crime being the extra use of said owner's coal in towing the convoy into port. Ingratitude is said to be the curse of republics, and in this case it seems to apply with startling force. Were it not for the safety of the passengers and specie it would be generally wished that some rebel pirate would gobble up one or more of the said steamboat man's vessels.—N. Y. Correspondence of the Alta.

It is difficult to make the pot boil with the fire of genius.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JANUARY 21, 1865.

THE DEATH OF EDWARD EVERETT—A GLANCE AT HIS LIFE AND SERVICES.

THE march of events is generally so equal that it is rarely distinguished by occurrences which affect the hearts of a whole community. The course of domestic life is daily disturbed by the changes incident to human nature, and yet the current of society is in no manner affected by them. But there are incidents in our national career which reach the bosoms of the whole people—as when the nation loses the life of one whose public services and private worth have endeared him to his countrymen.

The past three years have been years of household grief. During this period death has placed his foot over the threshold of almost every home in the land. And while all of us have been called upon to give up some life we loved, yet there has been no single death that has evoked the sympathy of the whole people. When a hero dies in the line of duty, it is but the accomplishment of his own glory—a sort of personal apotheosis—more to be envied than regretted. If a soldier falls, a robust substitute picks up and shoulders his musket, and all is soon forgotten, except by some loving wife or parent, of whose grief the world knows or cares nothing. It is not so when the statesman lies cold and voiceless, for great men are not easily replaced—these the whole nation mourns; and so it is, that within the past few days the announcement of the death of Edward Everett has elicited universal sorrow. A short review of his life and services will instruct us as to the extent of our bereavement.

Edward Everett was born in Dorchester, Mass., in 1794. He entered Harvard when most boys of his years are yet in the accidents, and at the age of seventeen he graduated with the highest honors of his class. At college, with his teachers and co-pupils, he bore a high character for scholarship in one so young; and such was his recognized merit, that, after his graduation, he was retained as tutor. While he held this position he studied divinity. As pastor of Brattle street church he soon became reputable for the force and vigor of his clerical discourses, and amid the duties of his pastoral charge, he found time to write and publish a work, defending Christianity against the attacks of a book on Judaism.

In 1814 he was selected for the chair of Greek literature at Harvard, then recently endowed by the munificence of a Bostonian. With a view to thoroughly prepare himself, he went to Europe, entered the University of Gottingen, and after two years of studies there, visited England, making the acquaintance of many of its most distinguished literary men. He remained abroad five years, sedulously fitting himself for the successful accomplishment of the duties attached to his professorship. On his return he delivered a series of lectures on Grecian archeology and literature, which, at that time, when classical knowledge was far from being so diffused as it is now, had an influence in making for his native State a character for educational privileges superior to any in the country. Contemporary with his efforts to build up a complete system of education, as editor of the North American Review, he attempted to create and foster a national spirit—an American spirit; to imbue his countrymen with a reforming and progressive quality that properly belonged to the new era of national development that commenced at the close of the war of 1812. With these laudable and patriotic efforts commences his public character—commences the period when he applied himself to emancipate his countrymen from blind dependence upon Europe, in teaching us the extent and grandeur of our geographical area, the pre-eminence we held in soil, in our unparalleled advantages of inter communication, and our coming physical and intellectual triumphs, if we were but true to ourselves and our opportunities. In pursuance of his plan, he attempted to educate the public by what is called "demonstrative oratory." His first effort was his celebrated discourse before the Phi Beta Kappa Society on "The circumstances favorable to the Progress of Literature in America." These truly patriotic characteristics of Mr. Everett procured him an unsolicited and unanimous nomination to Congress, where he served a decade of years. During his Congressional career he identified himself with every prominent public measure that came before Congress. As a member of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, he distinguished himself by his report on the Panama Mission. He was the chairman of the Select Committee on the celebrated Cherokee controversy; he was a member of the Bank Investigating Committee; he associated his name and vindicated his talent on the occasion of the well-known French Indemnity Bill, during Jackson's administration. In one word, he gave to his country his labor and his learning. Although he did so much in the Hall of Representatives, yet so methodical and unremitting his industry, that he found time to discuss the philosophy and practical bearing of prominent public measures, both in the columns of reviews and by oral addresses. His faculty of generalization, his logical lucidity of statement, and his varied and great learning, constituted him a great teacher, an eloquent missionary of the political faith he had adopted.

During his gubernatorial term of four years, his administration was directed to the advancement of all measures of general good, in building up and disseminating educational means which all classes could share in; developing the agricultural resources of the State; multiplying railroad facilities and revising the criminal laws—so humanizing and christianizing the poor vagrants from morality and religion, who, under anterior systems, were creatures to punish rather than reform.

In the year 1841 Mr. Everett was appointed to represent his country at the court of St. James. Webster was then Secretary of State. It was a period of great public alarm, when grave international questions were pending that had produced mutual acerbity of feeling, and even the effusion of blood. The Northeastern boundary dispute threatened every day to bring about a collision on the frontier; the Caroline had been burnt within our jurisdiction; McLeod had been arrested and was to be tried for an offence involving the forfeiture of his life; the Creole had been seized; the right of search claimed and exercised; the northern limits of Oregon disputed, and our fishermen driven by force from the Bay of Fundy. In all these serious questions he was unembarrassed with specific instructions. The Government knew that no one in the country was better informed on all these matters than Mr. Everett, and that to a philosophical mind and temper, he united diplomatic tact, coolness and suavity. Although the settlement of these disputes was ultimately transferred to Washington, yet the elucidation of all the points in controversy, as shown in the despatches of Mr. Everett, was of great assistance to Mr. Webster.

On his return from England, he applied himself to the collection and publication of his orations and speeches, which appeared in 1850, in two volumes, and subsequently he edited the well-known edition of Webster's works. These, with his duties as President of Harvard College, closely occupied him until he was called, in 1852, to the State Department, to succeed the lamented Webster. In this new position he eminently distinguished himself by his reply to France and England on the subject of the tripartite convention, in which he enunciated with great force and authority the policy and mission of the country. While holding this office he was elected by the State of Massachusetts to represent her in the Senate of the United States. The winter he took his seat was marked by the agitation of the Nebraska-Kansas bill, the introduction of which has led to the present attempt to disintegrate and destroy the country. Mr. Everett opposed the bill in an able speech; a few weeks later, in consequence of ill-health, he resigned his position. After some months of quietude he prepared his famous discourse on the character of Washington, which was delivered by him one hundred and twenty-two times for the benefit of the Mount Vernon Fund. This, taken in connection with his contributions to Bonner's paper, realized for the fund in question about $90,000—an instance of reward and labor that has no parallel, when we look to its pecuniary success, physical stamina and intellectual ability. While he was thus engaged in the effort to acquire for the whole people, in perpetuity, the sacred spot that held the honored remains of him whose highest title is "Father of his Country," and, by making it the common domain, thus centralize and strengthen a feeling of patriotism, this accursed rebellion broke out. It had been the aim of almost every address of Mr. Everett to increase and vivify a national pride in the breasts of all Americans—a pride in our institutions, progress and future, to make us a homogeneous people, and to build up a great national unity. The first gun fired on Sumter aroused him as it aroused all patriots. He saw in it an attempt at national demoralization and disruption—not merely our overthrow as a nation, but an attack on human liberty and the annihilation of the means by which all mankind would finally attain political and social redemption. The threatened calamity involved such awful results, the appliances and force of the Destroyer were so trained and prodigious, that Everett recognized it as the solemn and earnest duty of every lover of his country to exert his whole power to avert or stay the storm. By public addresses and newspaper articles, he tried to awaken the nation to a sense of its great peril—addresses remarkable for their philosophical reason and perspicuity. He disclosed the rebel designs; he united his voice with those of the constitutional authorities in arming and sending troops to the field; he welcomed with cordial greetings and bounteous provision the bleeding regiments torn by the havoc of battle, and, holding aloft the tattered flags, called for new defenders of our Constitution and homes. By such deeds and eloquent expressions, he aided the solemn work—the work to which he had given himself exclusively and earnestly. And in such a crusade—laboring in such a mission, while yet his powers were strong and vigorous—the true patriot, the accomplished gentleman died.

Mr. Everett was one of the most indefatigable workers in the country, a hard and careful student who prepared in the closet almost every word of his spoken addresses. His memory was so excellently disciplined, that, on the conclusion of a composition, he could repeat every word of it; and this faculty and training were of great advantage to a man whose intellectual fame rests on his speeches and orations. He was a scholar in its fullest sense, one who had explored and cultivated every field of human knowledge. In the classics, in Greek and Latin philology, he had few living superiors, and his critical erudition in mediæval and modern literature was second to none. His composition, its simplicity and lucid construction, its depth and solidity reminded us of "Doric pillars overlaid

With golden architrave."

Prescott and Irving excepted, his was the least ornate—the purest style of any American writer. Outside of the research, authority and philosophical structure of his oratory, it was as simple, ingenious and appreciable as freshest talk; and in its adaptiveness to common comprehension, resides his charm of language, and in it we recognize the perfection of style.

The general grief his death has occasioned, the kind and affectionate allusions to his head and heart, everywhere uttered and published, show the extent of our loss, and it teaches us the sad truth, that, one by one, the representative men of our American civilization are disappearing forever from this world. The corruptible part of him has been laid in earth, it rests on that spot from which the beacon fires of the Revolution first agitated and illumined the world. In the years to come thither will go all those who love worth, learning and patriotism, and on his tomb the chaplets will be ever green.

"Such graves as his are Pilgrim shrines,
Shrines to no code or creed confined;
The Delphian vales—the Palestines—
The Meccas of the mind."

PORTER AND BUTLER.

IN his official report of the capture of Fort Fisher, Admiral Porter travels slyly out from the path of his direct duty in order to reflect upon Butler, without mentioning that shelved General's name. Complimenting Gen. Terry in an enthusiastic manner, he leaves it for those to whom the despatches are addressed to draw their own inferences. In reference to this officer he says: "He is my beau ideal of a soldier and a General. Our co-operating action has been most cordial, and the result is a victory, which always, I predict, will be ours when the navy and army go hand in hand."

The delicacy of this innuendo of the gallant Admiral's, under the circumstances, we doubt. Fort Fisher was captured, and that fact alone, in view of the previous failure, would have spoken loudly enough had the Admiral given it without comment. As it is, people will somewhat doubt the sincerity of the praise bestowed upon Terry, since it looks so very like a back-cut at Butler.

So far as Butler is concerned, the probability is that he was spoiled by excessive praise in the beginning, and beguiled into believing himself a General when in reality he is nothing of the kind. A sharp, shrewd lawyer, well acquainted with human nature, he possesses administrative ability of a high order, as was evidenced during his regency at New Orleans. Not troubled much with scruples, he hesitated not as to the means to be employed in controlling the people who fell under his rule, and hence they at least came to fear him, if not to love him, the result being that peace and order obtained in New Orleans under his administration. But his military genius, first exhibited in the Big Bethel expedition, never met with any very eminent illustration, being taken by the multitude upon faith in the absence of any direct confirmation. It will be noticed that the civilians who have distinguished themselves in this war have done so simply by their deaths. Banks was accepted with a deal of éclat in the first glow of enthusiasm, but the bloom was brushed from his epaulettes by the first serious brush in the Shenandoah Valley; there was a blare of trumpets about Blair at occasional intervals, but he won no substantial laurel to his brow; and so with a long list of citizen generals. War is an art, and soldiers by education and profession are alone competent to lead soldiers; to this plain declaration of sentiment we can only add the hope that the day of lawyers and politicians as military leaders of our armies is forever done.

The next event in the fashionable world is the Ball to be given by Mrs. Gen. McDowell at the Occidental Hotel, on Tuesday evening next. Again the milliners and dress-makers are busy as bees, and ladies are laying their heads together in deliberation of the momentous question: What shall I wear?

DRAMATIC MENTION.

AT the Opera House on Saturday evening last, Mr. Kean as Richard III. was echoing the cry that had been loud on all lips throughout the glorious day: "A horse! A horse!! It was wise to ask for only one, as neither love nor money could have procured a pair. On Monday evening the mail of "Macbeth" and the male issue of Banquo's were brought upon the stage. It is in this play that the genius of Mr. Kean most fully vindicates itself; small in stature and possessed of at least an unimposing presence, the very opposite of the stalwart figure which rises in our minds as the true presentment of "Macbeth," speaking in querulous tones instead of a warrior's voice and rolling his r's further than Dunsinane wood was supposed to have travelled in a day, he still delights his audience so that they hang upon his slightest syllables, and bend forward with eager delight over every gesture, almost afraid to applaud lest they break the spell. If this be not a triumph, enhanced by natural disadvantages, show us its equal in the annals of the stage. In this same play the capacity of Mr. Catheart had excellent exemplification. Young and of a good presence, natural and graceful in manner, and possessed of a clear and sonorous voice, his "Maeduff" proved a great and decided hit, winning strongly accented applause and calls before the curtain—to which for some reason he did not respond. Mrs. Kean's "Lady Macbeth" was good, the famous soap and water scene being rendered very impressively. As one of the chief witches Mrs. Perry undertook a rather new line of character, sustaining it with marked ability, though, as a witch, she does not look quite as bewitching as in other costumes.

The Corsican Brothers took possession of the stage on Tuesday evening, and ran its three nights through like the genuine old tramp that it is. For a sensational play we assign to this the very highest rank. A strong plea for spiritualism, and evidently written by a strong believer in quick postal communication between the living and the dead, it is a pity that table-tipping and mysterious rappings had not been at the author's disposal that he might have been enabled to enhance his effects. It would have been difficult, however, to improve upon the plot, and as for the ghostly scenes, they could not have been better seasoned by Pepper's self. Audiences always draw their breaths slowly and bow their heads in a vivid consciousness of a supernatural presence when the pale murdered twin, rising slowly from what seems the solid stage, goes sliding along to the murmur of muffled music, on a concealed tram-way, to his brother's side, disappearing suddenly through a door with noiseless hinges, to become indistinctly visible again in the background, behind a curtain of blue gauze, where the fatal duel in the wood is reproduced by some shadowy daguerre with a fidelity which the real art can scarcely rival. It was a happy thought, that of the author, in producing first the weird picture of the duel as shown to the surviving brother, then the scene as it actually occurred, and immediately afterwards a counterfeit of the son and mother in phantom, viewing the same in precisely the same attitudes they occupied in reality when the ghost made his first revelation. So far as the thrilling is concerned, these Corsican Brothers can discount all the Otello's, Quadroons and Maroons that have been put upon the stage of late years. Mr. Kean as the two Franchis, is, of course, himself to the life, earnest and impressive, but illustrating his total incapacity for individualizing or clothing a character with anything other than his own physical peculiarities and vocal habits. A word is due to the excellence with which the piece is put upon the stage: Every effect is produced in a manner which leaves little to be suggested, the apparitions, in particular, being engineered with rare skill and dexterity. There is no lagging at any part of the piece, and no crudities; straight on it goes to its termination as though everything worked upon sliding grooves; and this is noticeable in all the pieces in which Mr. Kean appears—we do not know to whom the merit belongs, but credit is certainly due somewhere. Mr. Kean, by the way, first produced The Corsican Brothers upon the English stage, and it is his version of the play—more artistic by far than any other—that we have had at Maguire's. For an afterpiece to the Corsicans they gave us The Wonder—which may be termed a clear case of Ossa upon Pelion, or piling wonder on wonder. It is one of Coleman's best comedies, abounding in incident and situations, and it was capably played throughout; the Kean troupe of course having the principal parts, but the others making as much as possible of the crumbs that fell to their share. Mrs. Kean's forte is genteel comedy, and her "Donna Volante" was excellent; Mr. Kean, as "Don Felix," made some of those subtle points which galleries seldom detect and applaud, but which stamp the artist. Catheart, as "Col. Britton," was fair, but his chief merit seems to lie in a different line of character—he is rather too dramatic in style for such parts; Barry, as his Scotch servant, brightened up wonderfully and made a deal of fun—if he would but repair by dental aid the ravages which Time has wrought in his expressive mouth, the pleasantness of his personations would be materially added to. Mr. Hill has proven a very valuable acquisition to the company; always in readiness to take any part that may be assigned him and playing it well almost without exception, thoroughly reliable, singularly unpretending, and a good singer and dancer, he is rapidly becoming a necessity to the Opera House. Another transplantation from the Academy, Miss Kate Martin, has a vivacity and brusqueness about her that is novel and pleasing. Mrs. Perry fully established her claim to a rank we have before assigned her, as one of the best soubrettes of the day: the grace and dash she brought to her "Flora," in this play would make a hit anywhere. Mr. Everett made a very good "Lissardo," indeed, in conjunction with Mrs. Perry and Miss Martin contriving to find the funny-bone of the audience; but his "Chateau Renaud," in The Corsican Brothers, was not up to the mark—Mayo would have played it much better. Pierpont Thayer is looming up rapidly as a walking gentleman.

Mr. Coppin was announced to make "his last appearance but one" on Friday evening. As it has become necessary of late to put this paper to press on Friday afternoon in order to get the edition off in season for city circulation on Saturday morning, we obviously cannot speak critically of a performance which we have not witnessed. There is, however, a descent to cheap showman tricks in the advertisements of this gentleman which one would scarcely expect to find in the agent of such artists as the Kears, and which we take this occasion to very sincerely deprecate. Such queries as: "Do you know Jones?" placarded through the columns of newspapers; handbills headed "Conspiracy and Treason," and promising further "astounding revelations" of the "Knights of the Columbian Star," with all manner of "local hits and allusions," savor more of the melodeon style of attracting audiences than that which prevails in the higher walks of the profession. The sacrifice of dignity, however, has its reward, apparently, in full houses, for Friday evening of last week brought to this gentleman nearly as many dollars as the house would hold. That the expectations of the crowd were not fulfilled we know, newspaper notices to the contrary notwithstanding. We must confess to an inability to detect that merit in Mr. Coppin, as a comedian, which other critics—we hope they are honest in their judgements—profess to have discovered. He certainly is destitute of drollery, and his fun is of a very dreary character indeed. If called upon to characterize his style in one word we should do it by simply saying—barren. His acting is precisely that which any portly, good-natured looking man, with confidence sufficient to enable him to go upon the stage and carry him through his part, would furnish. In Cupid on the evening to which we refer, he was simply ridiculous without being at all funny. Capering about on the stage in short petticoats with gauze wings on one's shoulders is not a very lofty histrionic flight at best, but if a large man act the Cupid and have a nice sense of humor, it can be made very funny indeed; Mark Smith—a stock actor—for instance, would contrive to convulse an audience under such circumstances. To see Burton in such plays as The Toodles or Paul Pry and then Mr. Coppin! we have not the heart to attempt comparison. Plainly speaking, we think that great injustice has been done to a very worthy gentleman by unmerited praise and unqualified puffery. For it is very certain that if these laudatory "notices" precede him to New York, he will be very judiciously handled by the cautious critics of that city, who were cool occasionally over even Burton, who restrain frenzy and enthusiasm when holding an inquest over Jefferson and Clark, and who up to the present moment have not showered many adjectives about the ears of Owens. They have good comic actors in stock companies East—they are there the rule—and Mr. Coppin's claims will undergo a criticism enhanced in severity by the ill judged efforts of his friends of the Press upon this coast. That the statesman's laurels are his of right we do not doubt, but he is anything but a "capital comedian."

The Sacred Concerts at the Academy of Music have proved such an attraction that we believe Mr. Maguire intends to continue them to infinity. Two doorkeepers have been engaged to keep more people from crowding in than the house will hold, as well as to maintain order during the performance. We do not know whether or not, the manager, moved by this strongly manifested liking on the part of the multitude for Sacred Music, will eventually give Sacred Concerts every night and Saturday afternoons, but he surely has strong inducements to do so in the patronage thus generally given him. It must be excessively pleasant as well as encouraging to that gentleman, to have his efforts towards the development of a high musical taste among the people and their entertainment of Sunday evenings when churches are so crowded that they can't get into them, find this ready response. Why should melodeons flourish? why should free concert saloons where immorality and bad beer are dispensed at the hands of frowzy "waiter girls" be maintained, when a manager has but to inaugurate a season of Opera or a series of Sacred Concerts in order to make his eternal and temporal fortune? It is strange that a depraved taste should be fostered in the way of public entertainments, when an effort in an opposite direction has met with such signal success! Everyone knows that the Sunday evening performances at the Opera House before the pressure of popular sentiment compelled their suppression, were never attended by more than the house could comfortably hold. But the public having effectually shut up the theatre on Sunday nights—of course the public did it, for does not the public rule in this Democratic country?—mark the change; note the delighted rush of the public to the Academy of Music to listen to sacred music instead of secular tunes and profane plays on that blessed evening. We have but one suggestion to make to Mr. Maguire, and we doubt not that he will attend to it, for he seldom loses a good point. Let him have sermons at the Academy of Sunday evenings as well as sacred music, and we doubt not that the receipts of his house will be materially increased. It is strange, indeed, that this idea had not occurred to the authorities, and that they had not made this sacrifice to the popular sentiment incumbent upon all theatrical managers. If any doubt our statement that the Academy of Music is crowded on Sunday evenings, when sweet and sacred minstrelsy is given—why, let them go and see for themselves.

The Hippodrome still continues an attraction. Not satisfied, however, with what he has, manager Wilson has gone East for more—the more to whom reference is made is no relative of that thoroughly-good fellow, whose surname is James, already with us. They have chariot-racing, and hurdle-racing, and women-racing, monkey-racing, pony-racing, and Roman-racing, and foot-racing to a degree which tempts one to believe that the management have made that notable work, The Origin of the Races, a special study. Zoyara still delights people by his riding, though he no longer puzzles them as to his sex, a very general belief having been reached that, if not a man, he at least is not a woman. We started out with the intention of telling what they had at the Pavilion, but it is so much easier to enumerate what they have not that we choose the latter horn of the dilemma—thus, they have nothing that could offend the most fastidious.

A new candidate for the honors and emoluments which California showers upon its cantatrici, Mrs. Carrie Matteson, lately of Chicago—made her début at Mr. Hartmann's concert on Thursday afternoon. Platt's Hall is not remarkably well adapted for vocal effect, and empty benches are not calculated to add to its acoustic properties; nevertheless, in spite of the severe test to which she was thus subjected, the débutante won an immediate and an unqualified success. She is possessed of a full, firm, and flexible voice, well under her control, and carefully cultivated. To use a phrase which will be at once understood, she does not tug with her mouth alone, consequently her execution is without apparent effort, and her audience do not sit in a tremor of apprehension lest she break down in the middle of a note. Her first utterance says plainly: Have no fear for me; sit quietly and give yourselves up to the spell of the music, which I interpret without fatigue! The Chicago journals spoke highly of Mrs. Matteson's musical ability, and she had the disadvantage of being announced as "a splendid contralto." For a wonder she did not disappoint, and to say that she is a splendid contralto is to simply tell the truth. Established as it is on the firm basis of actual merit, Mrs. Matteson need have no fears as to the permanency of her success.

The performances of this afternoon and evening consist, as will be seen by turning to our advertisement columns, of the usual programme at the Hippodrome; at the Opera House of a varied entertainment in the afternoon, the minstrel company appearing in its course, and the Kears in Hamlet in the evening. On Sunday evening the usual sacred concert at the Academy of Music will be given; the Kears playing at the Opera House throughout the week as follows: Monday evening, in Othello; Tuesday, Richard II.; Wednesday, King John; and on Saturday evening next in Louis XI. Mr. Coppin makes his last appearance on Friday evening.

On Friday next J. H. Warwick, professor of elocution will read, at Platt's Hall, "The Seer," a patriotic poem by Miss Mary W. Richardson, of this city. A lady who is familiar with the poem describes it to us as a "series of beautiful pictures," and the appreciative private circle to whom it has been read, speak favorably of its merits. "Patriotic poems" are no rarity now-a-days, but a really good one, especially if written by a lady, should have the effect of filling Platt's Hall to overflowing. The occasion will be enlivened by patriotic music.

TO BE REGRETTED.—We are sorry to note the nomination, by the Union Convention of Tennessee, of the notorious Parson Brownlow as Governor. A parson without piety, coarse and vulgar in speech, writing and action; the author of diatribes which have few parallels in the language and which fall from a clergyman's lips with singular ill-grace; bringing with him only the doubtful recommendation of rant and rabies in professions of attachment to a Union whose interests have been perilled and retarded by just such followers, to offset palpable profanity and outspoken indecency, could not a better man have been spared to fill so good a place?

THE LITTLE FRENCHMAN AND HIS TOWN LOTS.

[THE following article was contributed by the late George P. Morris to the New York Mirror nearly twenty-five years since. It had point then, but unless we are mistaken in the location of the property described, had the little Frenchman held on to his "town lots," they would have made the Poopoo posterity rich down to a remote generation, as all that portion of Long Island has been filled up and built out, so that now drays rattle where waves rolled when Monsieur Poopoo went out to look at his possessions.]

HOW much real comfort every one might enjoy, if he would be contented with the lot in which heaven has cast him, and how much trouble would be avoided if people would only "let well alone!" A moderate independence, quietly and honestly procured, is certainly every way preferable even to immense possessions achieved by the wear and tear of mind and body so necessary to procure them. Yet there are very few individuals, let them be doing ever so well in the world, who are not always straining every nerve to do better, and this is one of the many causes why failures in business so frequently occur among us. The present generation seem unwilling to "realise" by slow and sure degrees, but choose rather to set their whole hopes upon a single cast, which makes or mars them forever!

Gentle reader, do you remember Monsieur Poopoo? He used to keep a small toy-store in Chatham, near the corner of Pearl street. You must recollect him, of course. He lived there for many years, and was one of the most polite and accommodating of shop-keepers. When a juvenile, you have bought tops and marbles of him a thousand times. To be sure you have; and seen his vinegar-visage lighted up with a smile as you paid him the coppers; and you have laughed at his little straight queue and his dimity breeches, and all the other oddities that made up the every-day apparel of my little Frenchman. Ah, I perceive you recollect him now.

Well, then, there lived Monsieur Poopoo ever since he came from "dear, delightful Paris," as he used to call the city of his nativity—there he took in the pennies for his kickshaws—there he laid aside five thousand dollars against a rainy day—there he was as happy as a lark—and there in all human probability, we would have been to this very day, a respected and substantial citizen, had he been willing to "let well alone." But Monsieur Poopoo had heard strange stories about the prodigious rise in real estate, and having understood that most of his neighbors had become suddenly rich by speculating in lots, he instantly became dissatisfied with his own lot, forthwith determined to shut up shop, turn everything into cash, and set about making money in earnest. No sooner said than done; and our quondam storekeeper a few days afterwards attended a most extensive sale of real estate, at the Mechanics' Exchange.

There was the auctioneer, with his beautiful and inviting lithographic maps—all the lots as smooth, and square, and enticingly laid out as possible—and there were the speculators—and there, in the midst of them, stood Monsieur Poopoo.

"Here they are, gentlemen," said he of the hammer; "the most valuable lots ever offered for sale. Give me a bid for them?"

"One hundred each," said a bystander.

"One hundred!" said the auctioneer; "scarcely enough to pay for the maps. One hundred—going—fifty—gone! Mr. H., they are yours. A noble purchase. You'll sell those same lots in less than a fortnight for fifty thousand dollars' profit!"

Monsieur Poopoo pricked up his ears at this, and was lost in astonishment. This was a much easier way of accumulating riches than selling toys in Chatham street, and he determined to buy, and mend his fortune without delay.

The auctioneer proceeded in his sale. Other parcels were offered and disposed of, and all the purchasers were promised immense advantages for their enterprise. At last came a more valuable parcel than all the rest. The company pressed around the stand, and Monsieur Poopoo did the same.

"I now offer you, gentlemen, these magnificent lots, delightfully situated on Long Island, with valuable water privileges. Property in fee—title unexceptionable—terms of sale, cash—deeds ready for delivery immediately after the sale. How much for them? Give them a start at something. How much?" The auctioneer looked around: there were no bidders. At last he caught the eye of Monsieur Poopoo. "Did you say one hundred, sir? Beautiful lots—valuable water privileges—shall I say one hundred for you?"

"Oui, monsieur; I will give you von hundred dollara-piece, for de lot vid de valuable vatare privelege; c'est ca."

"Only one hundred a-piece for these sixty valuable lots—only one hundred—going—going—going—gone!"

Monsieur Poopoo was the fortunate possessor. The auctioneer congratulated him—the sale closed—and the company dispersed.

"Pardonnez moi, monsieur," said Poopoo, as the auctioneer descended his pedestal, "you shall excusez moi if I shall go to votre bureau, your counting-house, ver quick to make every ting sure wid respec to do lot vid de valuable vatare privelege. Von leetle bird in de hand be vorth two in de tree, c'est vrai—eh?"

"Certainly, sir."

"Vell, den, allons."

And the gentlemen repaired to the counting-house, where the six thousand dollars were paid, and the deeds of the property delivered. Monsieur Poopoo put these carefully in his pocket, and as he was about taking his leave, the auctioneer made him a present of the lithographic outline of the lots, which was a very liberal thing on his part, considering the map was a beautiful specimen of that glorious art. Poopoo could not admire it sufficiently. There were his sixty lots as uniform as possible, and his little grey eyes sparkled like diamonds as they wandered from one end of the spacious sheet to the other.

Poopoo's heart was as light as a feather, and he snapped his fingers in the very wantonness of joy as he repaired to Delmonico's, and ordered the first good French dinner that had gladdened his senses since his arrival in America.

After having discussed his repast, and washed it down with a bottle of choice old claret, he resolved upon a visit to Long Island to view his purchase. He consequently immediately hired a horse and gig, crossed the Brooklyn ferry, and drove along the margin of the river to the Wallabout, the location in question.

Our friend, however, was not a little perplexed to find his property. Every thing on the map was as fair and even as possible, while all the grounds about him were as undulated as they could well be imagined, and there was an arm of the East-river running quite into the land, which seemed to have no business there. This puzzled the Frenchman exceedingly; and, being a stranger in those parts, he called to a farmer in an adjacent field.

"Mon ami, are you acquaint vid dis part of de country—eh?"

"Yes, I was born here, and know every inch of it."

"Ah, c'est bien, dat vill do," and the Frenchman got out of the gig, tied the horse, and produced his lithographic map.

"Den maybe you vill have de kindness to show me sixty lot vich I have bought, vid de valuable vatare privelege?"

The farmer glanced over the paper.

"Yes, sir, with pleasure; if you will be good enough to get into my boat, I will row you out to them!"

"Vat you say, sare?"

"My friend," said the farmer, "this section of Long Island has recently been bought up by the speculators of New York, and laid out for a great city; but the principal street is only visible at low tide. When this part of the East river is filled up, it will be just there. Your lots, as you will perceive, are beyond it, and are now all under water."

At first the Frenchman was incredulous. He could not believe his senses. As the facts, however, gradually broke upon him, he looked at the sky—the river—the farmer—and then he turned away and gazed at them all over again. There was his ground, sure enough; but then it could not be perceived, for there was a river flowing over it! He drew a box from his waistcoat pocket, opened it, with an emphatic knock upon the lid, took a pinch of snuff, and restored it to his waistcoat pocket as before. Poopoo was evidently in trouble, having "thoughts which often lie too deep for tears;" and as his grief was also too big for words, he untied his horse, jumped into the gig, and returned to the auctioneer in all possible haste.

It was near night when he arrived at the auction room—his horse in a foam and himself in a fury. The auctioneer was leaning back in his chair, with his legs stuck out of a low window, quietly smoking a cigar after the labors of the day, and humming the music from the last new opera.

"Monsieur, I have much plaisir to fin chez vous, at home."

"Ah, Poopoo! glad to see you. Take a seat, old boy."

"But I sall not take de seat, sare."

"No—why, what's the matter?"

"Oh, beaucoup de matter. I have been to see de gran lot dat you sell me to-day."

"Well, sir, I hope you like your purchase?"

"No, monsieur, but I do not like it all."

"I'm sorry for it; but there is no ground for your complaint."

"No, sare; dere is no ground at all—de ground is all vatare."

"Yon joke."

"I do not joke. I nevare joke; je n'entends pas raillerie. Sare, voulez vous have de kindness to give me back de money dat I pay?"

"Certainly not."

"Den vill you be so good as to take de East-river off de top of my lot?"

"That's your business, sir, not mine."

"Den I make you mauvaise affaire—von gran mistake!"

"I hope not. I don't think you have thrown away your money in the land."

"No, sare; but I have trow it away in de rivare!"

"That's not my fault."

"Yes, sare, but it is your fault. You're von ver granascal to swindle me out of de l'argent."

"Hollo, old Poopoo, you grow personal; and if you can't keep a civil tongue in your head, you must go out of my office."

"Vare shall I go to, eh?"

"To the devil, for aught I care, you foolish old Frenchman?" said the auctioneer, waxing warm.

"But, sare, I vill not go to de devil to oblige you!" replied the Frenchman, waxing warmer. "You cheat me out of all de dollar dat I make in Chatham Street; but I vill not go to de devil for all dat. I vill go and drown myself, tout de suite, right away."

"You couldn't make a better use of your water privileges, old boy!"

"Ah, miséricorde! je suis abimé. I am ruin! I am done up! I am break all into ten tousand leetle pieces! I am von lame duck, and I shall vaddle across de gran ocean for Paris, vish is de only valuable vatare privelege dat is left me a present!"

Poor Poopoo was as good as his word. He sailed in the next packet, and arrived in Paris almost as penniless as the day he left it.

Should any one feel disposed to doubt the veritable circumstances here recorded, let him cross the East-river to the Wallabout, and farmer J—will row him out to the very place where the poor Frenchman's lots still remain under water!

ELIANA.

[We make the following extracts from "Table Talk" in Eliana, a recently published collection of essays, poems and sayings of Elia, which Talfourd rejected in the preparation of his edition of that author's works. No excuse is necessary for offering our readers this luncheon of Lamb:]

A laxity pervades the popular use of words.

Parson W. is not quite so continent as Diana, yet prettily dissembleth his frailty. Is Parson W., therefore, a hypocrite? I think, not. Where the concealment of a vice is less pernicious than the barefaced publication of it would be, no additional delinquency is incurred in the secrecy. Parson W. is simply an immoral clergyman. But if Parson W. were to be for ever haranguing on the opposite virtue; choosing for his perpetual text, in preference to all other pulpit topics, the remarkable resistance recorded in the 39th of Exodus; [Genesis?] dwelling, moreover, and dilating upon it—then Parson W. might be reasonably suspected of hypocrisy. But Parson W. rarely diverteth into such line of argument, or toucheth it briefly. His ordinary topics are fetched from obedience to the "powers that are," "submission to the civil magistrate in all commands that are not absolutely unlawful;" on which he can delight to expatiate with equal fervor and sincerity.

The greatest pleasure I know is to do a good action by stealth, and have it found out by accident.

'Tis unpleasant to meet a beggar. It is painful to deny him; and, if you relieve him, it is so much out of your pocket.

Men marry for fortune, and sometimes to please their fancy; but, much oftener than is suspected, they consider what the world will say of it—how such a woman in their friends' eyes will look at the head of a table. Hence we see so many insipid beauties made wives of, that could not have struck the particular fancy of any man that had any fancy at all. These I call furniture wives; as men buy furniture pictures, because they suit this or that niche in their dining-parlors.

Your universally cried-up beauties are the very last choice which a man of taste would make. What pleases all cannot have that individual charm which makes this or that countenance engaging to you, and to you only perhaps, you know not why. What gained the fair Gunnings titled husbands, who, after all, turned out very sorry wives? Popular repute.

It is a sore trial when a daughter shall marry against her father's approbation. A little hard-heartedness, and aversion to a reconciliation, is almost pardonable. After all, Will Dockwray's way is, perhaps, the wisest. His best-loved daughter made a most imprudent match; in fact, eloped with the last man in the world that her father would have wished her to marry. All the world said that he would never speak to her again. For months she durst not write to him, much less come near him. But, in a casual rencounter, he met her in the streets of Ware—Ware, that will long remember the mild virtues of William Dockwray, Esq. What said the parent to his disobedient child, whose knees faltered under her at the sight of him? "Ha, Sukey! is it you?" with that benevolent aspect with which he paced the streets of Ware, venerated as an angel; "come and dine with us on Sunday." Then turning away, and again turning back, as if he had forgotten something, he added, "And, Sukey, do you hear?—bring your husband with you." This was all the reproof she ever heard from him. Need it be added, that the match turned out better for Susan than the world expected?

The vices of some men are magnificent. Compare the amours of Henry the Eighth and Charles the Second. The Stuart had mistresses: the Tudor kept wives.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REDUCTION and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs. in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration, particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The millers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The millers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the millers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the millers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the millers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or millers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERNATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

THIS useful invention is confidently recommended in all cases where it is desirable to create a great draft.

ON STEAMSHIPS

Its use will dispense with the use of the blower and the tall smoke stack, as it causes the furnace to consume the smoke. It has been successfully used on steamers, in San Francisco. The proprietor has permission to refer to Chas. Minturn, Esq., as to its value on steamers.

FOUNDRIES AND MACHINE SHOPS,

And all works requiring a great heat will find it of immense benefit.

Stephen Culverwell and Lyon & Co., Brewers, are now using it, and to them I refer.

ON SAILING VESSELS

It has been used to great advantage, where, on account of baffling winds, it is difficult to keep fire in the galley.

FOR SMOKY CHIMNEYS

It is a sure cure, and has been used on the Russ House and other first-class buildings in this city.

FOR VENTILATION,

It is unexcelled, and is recommended to architects and owners of buildings where ventilation is required.

FOR MINING PURPOSES

It is well adapted, thoroughly removing all foul air from shafts and tunnels.

The proprietor also refers to the following gentlemen who have used it: Capt. Lassen, brig Crimea; Dr. Nuttall Calhoun & Son, Printers; Edgerly & Wickman, Ship Chandlers; J. B. Quintin, builder; Philip Caduc, Esq.

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS.

THE most important event in our "record," this week is the capture, on Sunday last, of Fort Fisher at the entrance of Cape Fear River, off Wilmington. The first attack, which was made on the 24th of December, was a failure, owing, it is said, to a lack of co-operation between General Butler and Admiral Porter, who respectively commanded the land and naval forces. Butler was removed in consequence. The land force in the second and successful assault was under the command of Gen. Terry, to whom Admiral Porter gives the highest praise for the manner in which he conducted his part of the operation. The Union feeling seems to be growing stronger in Georgia. A Savannah correspondent of the N. Y. Times says that a special messenger left on the 9th inst., with despatches from the authorities of Savannah to Gov. Brown, relative to the return of Georgia to the Union. Alabama is also moving, and a resolution will soon be introduced in the Legislature of that State recommending a return to the Union. And so it goes!

January 13.—There are rumors that at the recent State elections in Georgia the people declared unanimously in favor of a return to the Union; also that Gov. Brown had disbanded the militia, who had returned to their homes. Nearly all the traders in Savannah have taken the oath of allegiance.

Senator Foote was arrested at Ocoquana, by two rebel cavalry men in trying to escape into our lines. The rebel House of Representatives have declared by resolution that Foote should be released from custody.

In the unsuccessful attack on Fort Fisher, 150 rebels under command of Major Reese, surrendered to six Union soldiers, and were marched into the Union lines with their arms shouldered, loaded and capped.

January 14.—An expedition up the Savannah river destroyed ten miles of the South Carolina and Columbia railroad.

The Union Convention of Tennessee passed resolutions declaring slavery forever abolished and prohibited throughout the State, and abrogating the declaration of State independence and the Military League made in 1861 with the Confederate States, and all laws and ordinances made in pursuance of them. Nearly 300 delegates participated in the vote. W. G. Brownlow is the nominee for the next Governor.

An expedition eight miles up the Turt'e river, Ga., destroyed the salt works on the creeks leading into Buffalo Swamp, captured a number of prisoners and liberated 30 refugees. 90 guerrillas were killed and a number of prisoners taken, in another expedition sent from Cape Arnuu to Cherokee Bayou.

The Union forces, about 4,000 strong, according to the Mobile Advertiser, are at Franklin Mills, on Dog river.

January 15.—The rebels, under Gen. Wickham, attack Beverly, Western Virginia, capture 400 prisoners and then retreat towards Lewishurg. The Union troops were taken completely by surprise.

Francis P. Blair (not Montgomery Blair, as erroneously stated in our last "record,") is still in Richmond on his Peace Mission. Nothing as yet has transpired, as to the effect of his interviews with the rebel Executive Officers. The Richmond papers state that his accidental meetings with several of his old acquaintances were characterized with the utmost cordiality on both sides.

Rosser's rebel cavalry in the Shenandoah Valley have gone into winter quarters.

A correspondent of the Philadelphia Press says that since the first exploration in the Dutch Gap Canal two more explosions have occurred with good results. The freshet in the James river is rushing through the canal with great rapidity, and promises to accomplish the desired result.

Fort Fisher was captured by assault on the 15th, after seven hours' fighting. The following despatch explains how it was done:

HEADQUARTERS, FEDERAL POINT, N. C., January 15th.—I have the honor to report that Fort Fisher was carried by assault this afternoon and evening, by Gen. Ames' Division, and the Second Brigade, First Division of the Twenty-fourth Army Corps, gallantly aided by a battalion of marines and seamen from the navy. The assault was preceded by a heavy bombardment from the fleet. The First Brigade of Ames' Division, under Curtis, soon effected a lodgment upon the parapet, but full possession of the works was not obtained until 10 o'clock at night. The behavior of the officers and men was most admirable. All works south of Fisher are now occupied by our troops. We have not less than twelve hundred prisoners, including Gen. Whitney and Col. Lamb, commandant of the fort. I regret to say our loss was severe, especially in officers. I am not yet able to form an estimate of the number of casualties. (Signed) ALFRED TERRY, Brevet Maj.-Gen. commanding the expedition.

The troops under Gen. Terry numbered about 10,000. The pirates Tallahassee and Chickamunga were in the fight, and were driven up the river. Our gunboats went up on Monday morning. The magazine in the fort exploded by accident, on that morning, killing and wounding 300 of our men. The following is the rebel official report of the capture:

HEADQUARTERS, JANUARY 16.—TO SECRETARY SEDDEN.—General Bragg reports that the enemy bombarded Fort Fisher furiously all day yesterday, and at 4 P. M. their infantry advanced to assault, a heavy demonstration at the same time being made against their rear by our troops. At half-past 6, Whiting reports their attack had failed, and the garrison was being strengthened with fresh troops; but at about 10 P. M. the fort was captured with most of its garrison. No further particulars are at this time known.

The Advertiser, in an article on the defenses of Wilmington, says that Fort Fisher has 72 guns, Caswell 87, Johnson 10, St. Philip 9. Other works, estimate, 30. The capture of all these works is now a foregone conclusion. Those south of Fisher are cut off, and must surrender on demand; while those above cannot hope to make a successful resistance against the approach of our fleet and army.

January 16.—Gen. Ord has been placed in command of the Army of the James, vice Butler, removed.

The Richmond Dispatch says that D. H. Hill has gone with Beauregard to Montgomery, Alabama, to communicate with Hood.

Deserters arriving at Knoxville say that Vaughn, with 700 men—all he has left—were at Bristol on the 4th. Breckinridge, with his command, has gone to the Valley of Virginia.

January 17.—In an examination before the Committee on the Conduct of the War, General Butler lifts the veil which has closely covered many disasters and blunders at the front at Petersburg. The testimony produced a profound impression, and a summons was issued for Grant and other high officials.

Pierre Soule has gone to Mexico on a mission for the Confederate States.

January 18.—The Charleston Mercury, in speaking of the condition of the rebel army in South Carolina, gives the most deplorable picture for the cause of the Confederacy. It says that the troops are a herd of stragglers and outlaws, under the command of imbeciles. It adds: "The path we are now travelling is straight to destruction; the result of the next month will bring the Confederacy to the ground, or will restate it in power. Without reform we are doomed."

Gen. Meagher arrived from Chattanooga with several thousand veteran troops, of the Fifteenth and Seventeenth Army Corps, organized as a provisional division of the Army of the Tennessee, and en route to join Sherman at Savannah, via New York.

LOCAL ITEMS.

Bishop Kip has resigned the pastorate of Grace Cathedral.

Flags were displayed at half-mast on many public buildings, on Monday, as a mark of respect to the memory of Edward Everett.

The Board of Trustees of the Home for the Care of the Inebriate have elected the following gentlemen to assist them in their labors: Horatio Stebbins, Royal Fisk, J. A. J. Bohen and A. Seligman.

On the 13th inst., James Irwin, owner of a hog ranch on the San Bruno road, near this city, was shot fatally by Barney Olwell. Failure to pay a small debt at the time promised is all the excuse offered by the murderer, who is in custody.

Barney Gillan, arrested some months ago charged with robbing Lund, a discharged soldier, has been convicted by the County Court. Furley, a co-defendant in the same case, forfeited his bail; a bench-warrant for his arrest was issued.

Caroline Brown (colored) has been awarded $500 to compensate her for ejection from a car of the Omnibus Railroad Company. Surely the road to fortune—for dusky travellers—is the railroad. Gentlemen conductors, beware of Brownettes.

Pioche, Bayere & Co., a few days since placed on record a mortgage to Abel Guy, upon city property for the sum of $100,000, bearing interest at the rate of 1½ per cent. per month. The mortgage is given in adjustment of old transactions with French creditors of the house.

Charles Scammon, aged about fifteen years, a son of the Captain of the revenue cutter Shubrick, received a severe wound in his left arm, by the accidental discharge of his gun, on Saturday last, while hunting on Mission Bay.

The anniversary of Washington's Birthday, (Feb. 22d.) will be celebrated by the First Artillery Regiment with a grand ball to be given at Union Hall. As the First and foremost in suitably remembering the occasion, doubtless the regiment and the ball will be duly remembered.

The wreck of the Anne Parry, near the Cliff House, attracts a great many visitors, who, as Mr. Star eloquently observes (in the morning papers), are afforded "an opportunity of estimating the power of sea and waves, and the risks of a sailor's life, by examining the wreck, lying on the beach, near the hotel."

The funeral of Bernard Hagan, late Foreman of Broderick Engine Company, No. 1, was a tribute of affection and respect which will long be remembered. Every member of the company with which he had been connected was present; the other companies were largely represented, who were joined by citizens of almost every nation and faith.

An Irishman whose name has not been ascertained, was found dead on the Bay Side road, Sunday morning. He had been seen in an intoxicated condition the day previous, and was known to be extremely destitute. He "had on dark cloth sack coat, cotton cassimere pants, an old light colored soft felt hat, no vest or cravat;" was about five feet in height, had dark hair and long red beard.

There has been a dissolution of the firm of Austin & Schmitt, Mr. Austin retiring. This announcement will be heard with regret by the great trading public to which Mr. Austin has endeared himself by his engaging manners and his sterling honesty. It is not very likely, however, that he will forsake a field where he can always carry with him a parish of customers, and we look to see him at the head of some other house, soon.

The Alta kindly mentions an unfortunate family named Fanjoy, living in a small house on the top of the sand-hill on the north side of O'Farrell street between Powell and Mason. Fanjoy, a painter by trade, fell from a scaffold, about two years ago; one arm was so badly crushed that it was amputated, and his spine was so much injured that he has been unable to earn anything. Our charitable people are interesting themselves in the matter.

The charges of embezzlement, neglect of duty, etc., against Lieut. George M. Wright, Third Artillery (Regulars) have been sustained by self-admission; he forfeits all pay and allowances, and is dismissed from the service. In the opinion of Gen. McDowell, "the conduct of the accused was not the result of a deliberate plan or the consequence of confirmed depravity, but of an act done under bad influence, while in a state of unnatural excitement."

The mate of the ship John Franklin arrived in this city Wednesday, and reported the total loss of the ship at a small cove ten miles south of Half Moon Bay. The captain, supercargo, and eleven seamen were drowned; the chief mate and seven sailors landed safely. Owing to dense fog, no observation had been obtained for forty-eight hours, and Captain Despeau supposed that he was seventy miles from shore, when, too late, the error was discovered. A heavy surf was breaking on the beach, and the greater part of the cargo came ashore after the ship went to pieces. Charles W. Brooks & Co. were the consignees of the Franklin.

A sad accident happened on Sunday afternoon, resulting in the death of a son of Mr. Wadsworth Porter, of the Fashion Stables. The little fellow was playing with some companions on the corner of Howard and Seventh streets, the locality of the famous Lake Pioche, when by some accident he fell in, drowning before help could reach him, though it was soon afforded. Mr. Porter, with his wife, started for Los Angeles on a pleasure and health trip a few days before, and sadder intelligence could not well be conveyed to them. The boy was staying with Mr. Porter's mother-in-law, Mrs. Mandeville, residing at 413 Dupont street; kind friends came to the assistance of that lady, took the body in charge, and laid it out tenderly. It has been placed in a vault in Lone Mountain, awaiting the parents' return. "George Ellis" was a bright, active boy, about seven years old, and a very general favorite; the parents have much sympathy in their sad and sudden bereavement.

Christian Tedmire, a counterfeiter of dimes and half-dimes, was arrested Thursday morning; he has made full confession of guilt.

A Vocal and Instrumental Concert for the benefit of the Catholic Free Schools of this city will be given at Union Hall, Jan. 26th. The object is of a most deserving character, and our citizens will cheerfully promote it, we doubt not, by their attendance.

Samon Elda, a member of South Park Horse Company, while answering the call of duty at a fire alarm on Folsom street, Thursday evening, suddenly fell and expired.

The trotting match announced for Friday, between Black Bess and George M. Patchen, Jr., was postponed in consequence of the lameness of the mare.

The Camanche did not make her trial-trip on Thursday. Regardless of the pleasure anticipated by the select company invited, a mud-bar had intruded itself, over or out of which the contractors were unable to move the vessel. The trip to Mare Island was postponed for a few days only.

Sunday last having been announced as the last opportunity the public would have to pay their money and investigate the mysterious monitor, the Camanche was visited by several hundred people. Her engines were placed in motion, and all the machinery worked well. It would be a useless repetition to describe the vessel. Those who don't know her owe the San. Com. a quarter (and it is no great stretch of credulity to believe that they will still be allowed to liquidate.) The 42,000-pound Peace Commissioners were objects of special interest. There is no reason to doubt their effectiveness, though they have not yet, we are informed by a cotemporary, been "tested" with powder and ball by the authorities. They had a foundry test before they left New York, but they were found wet on their arrival, and their size does not seem to avail against further indignities.

Prof. Miel's Institute at South Park, (of which the Kindergarten is a peculiar feature, wherein physical development attends on mental culture with good effect,) opened in its new building on Saturday evening last. The building is fifty feet square; the basement is devoted to the Kindergarten for the smaller pupils; on the principal floor is the school-room, parlor, sitting-room, library and music-room; the upper story affords spacious and convenient sleeping apartments. A pleasing incident, on the opening occasion, was the presentation of a beautiful American flag by Misses King and Staples on behalf of the children; the Professor was taken by surprise, but in a neat speech surrendered willingly to his fair captors. Mr. and Mrs. Leach and Mrs. Hanmond entertained the visitors with choice melodies, and the children treated them to a song in French; a poem, written for the occasion by Frank Bret Harte was read by Mr. Wendt. Prof. Miel's institute has about fifty pupils, and is rapidly growing in public confidence and support.

INTERIOR ITEMS.

The dwelling of Patrick Hues, in Stockton, was destroyed by fire, Jan. 16th; the family narrowly escaped being burned to death.

Charles Smith has been found guilty of murder in the second degree in killing Michael Madden, in Virginia City, a month ago.

At La Paz, Arizona, flour is sold at $14 per hundred pounds; first quality bacon, 23c., and Sandwich Island sugar, 20c. to 30c. per pound.

John Chmreh, one of the proprietors of the Virginia Daily Union, has been elected State Printer of Nevada.

The Ophir mine is still flooded with water. The stroke of the pump is being altered from twenty-six inches to six feet.

A Convention of delegates from the various Masonic Lodges in Nevada met in Virginia City, on the 16th, to organize a State Grand Lodge.

Petitions for a post route from Los Angeles, Cal., to Fort Mohave, Arizona, have been sent to the Post Office Department; there is so much necessity for the service that it should be granted at once.

The Marysville Appeal is informed that the farmers of Sutter county are preparing to raise larger grain crops than during any former year—some individuals sowing from 300 to 400 acres.

On the 16th, a collision occurred on the Pacific Railroad near Dry Creek, during the prevalence of a dense fog. Several cars were displaced, but nobody was hurt.

Dr. Cozzens, who some time ago brutally assaulted Mrs. Dr. Ely at her house in Russian River, could not make the plea of insanity avail; he has been found guilty of assault with a deadly weapon.

C. V. Livermore was accidentally killed at Austin, Nevada, a few days ago. He was slaughtering hogs, and, having shot one, threw his revolver on the ground, when it exploded, lodging a ball in his groin.

It is "estimated" that the Buena Vista (Tulare county) Petroleum Company can make their wells yield 250,000 gallons of oil per day, which enormous product may be conducted ninety-two miles to a seaport by means of pipes.

The steamer Young America, (Captain Shallcross), on the 13th inst. ran upon a snag near Hock Farm, on the Feather river, and in a short time sunk to her guards. No lives were lost; the freight was saved. The Swallow takes the place of the Young America in the Sacramento and Marysville trade.

Editors Ridge and Beckett met in Grass Valley a few days since, when, in consequence of previous mutual personalities, Ridge proposed an immediate exchange of "lended matter;" Bennett declined the invitation at that time and place, but intimated a willingness to be amenable to the "code;" whereupon a challenge was given and accepted. These facts we learn from the Nevada Transcript.

Los Angeles county will not be known or unappreciated in future. It has a live, wide-awake newspaper, the Wilmington Journal, edited by Judge Wm. Smith, who evinces an industry and attention to local interests which must prove highly beneficial to his section. The Judge, also, we observe, finds time and space to indulge his classical proclivities. We only wonder that Blackstone is not given a corner.

From the Sonora Democrat of the 14th inst., we learn that Santiago Melino, Pepe Nalle, Isidro Sanchez and Santiago Goday, (Chilenos,) died recently at Italian Bar, soon after drinking wine and eating green pickled beans. Their throats swelled up, causing suffocation, but which article is accountable for the poisoning is uncertain. We should think after partaking of such a mixture, a man would naturally say his prayers. Charles Mesar, a Frenchman, indulged similarly, and "still lives," though shaky.

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electro-pathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will be made use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathize with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required! All letters answered with promptness and with pleasure, if directed to

MR. CHRETIEN PFISTER, No. 221 Montgomery street, under the Russ House, respectfully calls the attention of the public to his extensive assortment of Portmyners, Trunks, Hair-pins, Hair of all lengths and colors, Wigs, Toupes, Combs of every style; Cravats of all kinds; Jourdan's Gloves for ladies and gentlemen; Suspenders, Shirts and Collars; new styles of Head Dresses, and all the latest Parisian accessories of the Lady's and Gentleman's toilet table. Having made new arrangements with his agent in Paris, he can now offer to his numerous customers superior advantages over any others in the trade. Six artist coiffeurs will always be found ready for business in the hair-dressing room. A special apartment is provided for the coiffure of ladies.

RUPTURE.—We call attention to the advertisement of Professor A. FOLLEAU, Pupil of Charriere of Paris, Surgical Machinist of the French Benevolent Society, who has made the Treatment of all Deformities of the Body, and the construction and application of peculiar surgical instruments for the treatment of Rupture, Spinal Complaints, snags for club feet, etc.; and the construction of Artificial Legs, Arms, Crutches, etc. Prof. Folleau's office is 624 Washington street, between Montgomery and Kearny streets. Manufactory, 232 Sutter street, San Francisco. Office Hours, from 9 A.M. to 4 P.M.

WET AND DRY.—What a great propensity people have for imbibing "something" in rainy weather! How can one account for the paradoxical fact that the wetter they get the drier they are? We dropped into Squarza's yesterday afternoon, and from the concourse we found practicing at his bar, concluded that Signor Squarza was a great benefactor in these wet times, and that the compounds of his laboratory were more sought after than India-rubber overcoats and umbrellas.

RICHES HAVE WINGS.—Nothing illustrates this more forcibly than the recent fall in mining stocks. Therefore, provide a certainty for your family in the future by insuring your life in the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company—cash assets, $6,500,000.

CURE YOUR COLD!

SAVE YOUR LUNGS!

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

HAS CURED THOUSANDS!

—AND—

IT WILL CURE YOU!

"A Cough is generally the effect of a cold which has either been improperly treated or entirely neglected. When it proves obstinate, there is always reason to fear the consequences, as this shows a weak state of the lungs, and is often the forerunner of consumption"—Buchan's Domestic Medicine.

STOP THAT COUGHING!

Some of you can't, and we pity you. You have tried every remedy but the one destined by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure; but

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP!

Is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by its surprising curative powers.

WHAT KILLED HIM?

Dr. Hall, in his Journal of Health, speaking of the death of Washington Irving, asks the above question, and adds: "He might well have remained with us for some years to come had it not been for advice, kindly intended, no doubt, but given in thoughtlessness and reckless ignorance.

HE HAD A COLD!

Which, by some injudicious prescription, had been converted into Asthma." Let me say to Dr. Hall, that "prescription" was not

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP.

Keep it in the house—use it freely—give it to your children upon the slightest indication of a cold, and you will think and speak of it as all do who have become acquainted with its merits.

THE GREAT SEWING MACHINE

WAR!

THE FIRST GUN!

(October 5th, 1864.)

AHEAD, AS USUAL!

TWO FIRST PREMIUMS

AWARDED TO

GROVER & BAKER,

AT THE

Oregon State Fair,

JUST CLOSED AT SALEM,

FOR THE BEST SEWING MACHINES

—AND—

BEST MACHINE WORK!

OVER THE

Wheeler & Wilson,

FLORENCE,

And all other Machines on Exhibition!

(October 6.)

The Florence Sewing Machine

—AND—

Work done on the FLORENCE have taken all the First Premiums awarded to Sewing Machines and Machine work at the Fairs of California in 1864.

Read the report of the Committee on Sewing Machines at the great Industrial Exhibition of the Mechanics' Institute:

THE FLORENCE.—We have given this new Sewing Machine a careful and minute examination. Its simple and finished mechanical construction, and the obvious adaptability of each part to its work, has been to us an interesting study. It differs essentially from other Sewing Machines, having many new and peculiar features. It makes four kinds of stitch, each alike on both sides of the fabric, has a reversible feed motion, and sews any thickness of goods without change of tension. We consider the "FLORENCE" a decided improvement in sewing mechanism.

COMMITTEE.

S. O. BRIGHAM, Pioneer Sewing Machine Agent on the Pacific Coast, and five years San Francisco agent for the Grover & Baker Machine.

O. C. WHEELER, who has been on more Sewing Machine Committees than any other person in California.

A. F. HITCHCOCK, Practical Machinist, eleven years in the employ of the Grover & Baker Co., the past five years as adjuster in their San Francisco office.

MRS C. M. BLAIN.
MRS A. J. TURNER,
MRS H. ROSEKRANS.

(October 10.)

AN UNMITIGATED HUMBUN!

The Agent of a certain Sewing Machine evidently intends, by humbug and deception, to foist his wares upon the public, instead of endeavoring by the merit of the article (if it possesses any) to attain an honorable position among those so well and favorably known. He advertises thus:

"The FLORENCE Machine, and work done on the FLORENCE, have taken ALL THE FIRST PREMIUMS awarded to Sewing Machines and Machine Work at the Fairs of California in 1864."

That the ubiquity of the insinuation contained above may deceive no one, we would say that ALL the Fairs in California in 1864, at which ANY premium has been awarded, is ONE—the Mechanics', just closed, whose official Report reads thus:

"Sewing Machines.—Premium to the Florence, no competition." This is the OVERWHELMING success which has attended the FLORENCE Machine at "ALL the Fairs in California in 1864."

And again the Report reads thus:

"Machine Sewing.—Premium to Mrs. Nancy Barton."

As the FLORENCE Machine claims the first premium on Machine Work, and we do not "see it in that light," we publish the following from Mrs. Barton:

SAN FRANCISCO, October 7th, 1864.

The Machine Sewing for which I received the First Premium at the Mechanics' Institute Fair was executed on the GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINE, which style I have had in constant use for five or six years, and consider superior to all others.

MRS. NANCY BARTON.

So the FLORENCE Machine, with NO COMPETITION, did obtain a Premium on the Machine, and DID NOT obtain ANY Premium on Machine Work as claimed! Even the "Card" published as a COMMITTEE REPORT loses in a slight degree its importance, as follows:

Extract from the signatures on "Committee Report," published by the FLORENCE Agent.

"O. C. WHEELER, who has been on more SEWING MACHINE Committees than any other person in California."

THE SEWING MACHINE WAR.

Mr. Wheeler writes thus:

"* * * A gentleman called at my office at a time when I was exceedingly busy, and asked me to append my name to a report which he held in his hand on Sewing Machines, then exhibiting at the 'Industrial Fair of the Mechanics' Institute' in this city. I said, 'I have no knowledge of being on a Committee, and have made no examination.' He informed me that as the FLORENCE was the only Machine on exhibition, and had no competition, an examination was unnecessary. I then wrote my name and he left."

I WOULD NOT have served on a Committee or signed any report had there been any competition, for the reason that my family have used the GROVER & BAKER Machine for several years, and would be unwilling to change it for any other.

I do not remember having ever served on a Committee or signed a report on Sewing Machines before. The statement that I have "served on more Sewing Machine Committees than any other person in California" is therefore untrue and wholly unauthorized.

O. C. WHEELER.

San Francisco, October 7th, 1864.

Thus the advertisement of the FLORENCE agent from first to last, is a humbug, and nothing else.

The only Fair on the Pacific Coast where the FLORENCE Machine has been exhibited in competition for a Premium against others was at the Oregon State Fair, in September, where it was essentially defeated, and two First Premiums awarded GROVER & BAKER for best Sewing Machine and Machine Sewing.

R. G. BROWN, Agent,
329 Montgomery street.

(October 19.)

REPLY TO

THE UNMITIGATED HUMBUN!

CARD OF R. G. BROWN.

A new Sewing Machine, recently introduced on this Coast, having taken all the honors awarded to Sewing Machines and Sewing Machine Work by the Fairs of California in 1864, an agent for one of the old established Machines, evidently worried, endeavors by ridicule and the charge of humbug to hide from the eyes of the public the magnitude of the victories achieved by this new comer.

The FLORENCE and the Work done on the FLORENCE, have taken five First Premiums instead of one, as would be inferred from the statement of the agent of the Grover & Baker Machine, and no greater triumph could be desired for the FLORENCE than the fact that it had "no competition" at a Fair like the Grand Industrial Exhibition of the Mechanics' Institute just closed, held, too, in San Francisco, where nearly every description of Sewing Machine in the known world is represented.

If Mrs. Nancy Barton intends in her note to claim the Premium on Machine Sewing at the late Mechanics' Fair, she has made a great mistake, as the Premium was awarded to work done on the FLORENCE. The "Sun Bonnet" on which she took a Premium was classed with Fancy Needlework, and was not examined by the Committee on Sewing Machine Work.

From Mr. O. C. Wheeler's statement some have incorrectly inferred that his signature was obtained by some party interested in or connected with the FLORENCE. The Committee were chosen in the usual manner, and we supposed Mr. Wheeler, as one of them, did his duty properly. If his time would not admit of this, it would have been more satisfactory to all concerned had he declined to serve.

From the above, which we are prepared to substantiate to the letter, it will be seen that the FLORENCE advertisement, which the Grover & Baker agent calls an unmitigated humbug was true in every particular, excepting the statement that Mr. Wheeler had been on other Sewing Machine Committees. His connection with the State Fairs as Secretary making it necessary for him to have much to do with Sewing Machines and Sewing Machine Committee reports, led to this very natural mistake; while the notice of the Grover & Baker agent, to which he gives so appropriate a heading, contains many misstatements and ambiguously worded "Cards" that are liable to be misconstrued.

SAMUEL HILL,

General Agent Florence Sewing Machines,
111 Montgomery Street, S. F.

(October 22.)

THOSE

AGAIN!

The "Reply" of the Agent of the FLORENCE Machine is fluent with such aspiring words as "Triumphs," "Victories," "Honors," and the like, which, as applied to any events in the history of that Machine, are simply ridiculous.

The "magnitude" of the "victories" attained by the FLORENCE is apparent to none but himself. "Show them up, Mr. Hill; give the public an opportunity of realizing the vastness of 'all the honors' conferred in so lavish a manner."

Show them if you can, and name any premium your Machine has ever received at any Fair over any first, second, or third-class machine in existence!

Perhaps it was an "honor" to exhibit against the GROVER & BAKER Machine at the Oregon State Fair, just closed, where Two First Premiums were awarded the GROVER & BAKER over the FLORENCE. Will Mr. Hill name any first premium his Machine has ever received for Sewing Machine work in competition with others?

THE SEWING MACHINE WAR.

The unequivocal "triumph" of the Florence Machine at the Mechanics' Institute Fair, and its single specimen of sewing at the Stockton Fair—without competition in either case—is certainly tremendous.

A contented mind is a continual feast. As you say you desire no greater triumph for the Florence than the fact that it had no competition at the Mechanics' Fair, allow us to congratulate you on so readily attaining your desires. All the honors of this bloodless "Victory" undoubtedly are yours, and, as we do not deny it, we trust your laurels may rest easily on your triumphant brow.

Your complete satisfaction in such a result, where there was no competition, and by the rules of the Society the Exhibitors were allowed to select their own Committees, will be more fully appreciated by a sympathizing public in consideration of the immense risk and great danger in which you stood of being defeated (?) by your selected Committee of interested friends and owners of the Florence Machine. Advertise your single-handed "Victories," proclaim your undivided "Honors"—make much of your one-sided "Triumphs," unequalled in their overwhelming (?) "magnitude," but until you can strengthen them by a conquest over some third, second, or first-class Machine, they will be but as sound and fury—signifying nothing.

The Grover & Baker is the only First Premium Sewing Machine, having received every First Premium awarded any Sewing Machines when in competition, in 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864.

R. G. BROWN, Agent,
329 Montgomery street.

Having heard to-day for the first time that the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company claim

THE SEWING MACHINE WAR.

he First Premium on Sewing Machines and Sewing Machine Work at the Oregon State Fair, held in Salem, September, 1864, and being one of the Committee on Sewing Machines and Sewing Machine Work at said Fair, I feel it my duty to make, and take pleasure in making the following statement:

Three (if not all) of the Committee were selected by a Mr. Johnson, (an employe of the Grover & Baker Company,) and after a careful examination of the Sewing Machines and Machine Work on exhibition, and a long consultation, it was finally decided and agreed by the Committee, to award the First Premium to the FLORENCE Machine as the best Machine for doing all grades of work, and a Premium to the Grover & Baker Machine for embroidery; and the Committee reported such decision to the President of the Fair, Judge Thornton, who wrote out the report and read it to the Committee, as above stated, four of whom signed it without reading it, the other member of the Committee having been called away. The above is a true statement of the views of the Committee and their final decision.

MARY A. HOWE.

STATE OF OREGON,
County of Multnomah, ss.

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned, a Notary Public in and for said County and State, Mary A. Howe, who, being first duly sworn, says the above statement is true, as she verily believes.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my notarial seal, this 4th day of November, 1864.
(Notarial Seal.) J. N. DOLPH,
Notary Public, Multnomah County, Oregon.

STATE OF OREGON,
County of Linn, ss.

I have read the above statement, (I being one of the Committee mentioned,) and the same is true to the best of my knowledge and belief.

EMILY C. GRIFFIN.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 13th day of December, 1864.

JAMES ELKINS,
County Clerk, Linn County, Oregon.

I was one of the five ladies comprising the Committee for the examination of Sewing Machines at the late Oregon State Fair, and am the party referred to above as having been called away before signing our Report. I hereby say that the above statements are true as to the decision of the Committee.

MARY MILLER.

Albany, Oregon, December 13th, 1864.

Copy of the Bogus Report which was fraudulently substituted in the place of the Real Decision of the Committee, and which they signed without reading:

SEPTEMBER 29th, 1864.

We, the undersigned, a Committee appointed at the Fourth Annual Fair of the Oregon State Agricultural Society to examine and report upon the merits of different Sewing Machines on exhibition, have endeavored to perform the duty with care and impartiality. In view of all the facts, we have decided to award the First Premium to the Grover & Baker Machine, and the Second to the Florence. The principal fact influencing our decision in awarding the First Premium to the former, was the circumstance that it embroidered, while the other does not. We have, however, no hesitancy in saying that both have great merits, and we recommend them both to the patronage of the Oregon public.

THE BACHELOR'S DREAM EXPLAINED.

I think you remember that some months ago, I was courting a handsome young girl; Since then I went travelling up country, you know, And I've now lost the run of my Belle.

I loved her so dearly—I do love her yet, Of course she must know very well: Indeed, I am ready to go in a fit Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

I've made an inquiry of all the young chaps— Been searching at every hotel; I've now and then culled out old Schiedam Schnapps Since I've lost the run of my Belle.

Kept running all day like a fool in the street, To search for another young girl; And every fine lady I chance for to meet, I've inquired for my old lover, Belle.

I start for a Photographic Gallery, To look for my sweet little Belle; And who in the name you think I should see? A face of that very same girl!

I then said, "Dear Bello, I've caught you at last; Are you lying, or here in disguise?" And what do you think, my friends, it was? A picture of her in life size.

Now to be seen at H. BUSH'S Gallery, corner of Post, Market and Montgomery streets, entrance opposite the Masonic Hall. oc29-3m

ST. VALENTINE'S DAY!

MARY'S VALENTINE.
Bright flowers shall bloom wherever we rove,
A voice divine shall talk in each stream,
The stars shall look like worlds of love,
And this earth be all one beautiful dream,
In our eyes—if thou'lt be mine.

KATY'S VALENTINE.
Among the many fair and bright,
My fancy early singled thee;
Then bend on me thine eyes of light,
And all my love shall flow to thee.

MAGGIE'S VALENTINE.
Yes, I'm happy while fate leaves me
One kind heart to warmly prize,
While the light of pure affection
Beams within thy gentle eyes.

ALLIE'S VALENTINE.
May'st thou live in joy forever!
Naught from thee true pleasure sever;
From thy heart arise no sigh,
And no tear bedew thine eye;
Joys be mine, cares be few,
Smooth the path thou shalt pursue;
And Heaven's richest blessings shine,
Ever on both thee and thine.

NETTIE'S VALENTINE.
Oh, speak not of daisies or rosebuds of Spring,
Or bright pearly dewdrops, or any such thing,
For thy worth and virtues much more do combine,
And gladly I'd take thee for my Valentine.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WHITE & BAUER, News Dealers, No. 413 Washington street, are General Agents for THE CALIFORNIAN in the interior counties of this State; also, for the adjacent States and Territories.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JANUARY 28, 1865.

OUR readers will notice that the exigencies of short columns and a pressure of advertisements compel a different "make up" of the paper this week, and the omission of several editorials which were in type. To our friends, a better apology than advertisements afford, could not be offered, and others we do not care to please. Certainly the proprietors will not complain, let the occurrence be repeated as often as it may, and the friends of whom we have just spoken, will recognize in it an assurance of the prosperity of the paper. Of this latter, however, no apprehension need be entertained. THE CALIFORNIAN is now a fixed fact, paying its way better, perhaps, than any other weekly in the State. It will be noticed that each number is now cut and stitched; this, of course, entails increased expense, but we are justified in the outlay by the patronage bestowed upon the paper, and it need not be thought that improvement is to stop here. New features will be inaugurated until THE CALIFORNIAN is indeed made what some of its rather too partial friends now claim it to be—the best journal on the continent.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THE multiplication of new books is marvellous. To keep pace with the literature of the day requires more time than many men have at their disposal as well as more money—for books are not to be bought with paper. Roman & Co., in another column, advertise a small cargo of new books received by the last steamer, besides loading our desk with "editors' copies" to an extent which is almost appalling, when we reflect that they are there for "notice." We are pleased to find a beautiful edition of Præd's Poems among them, and this reconciles us to the presence of others to which we do not take so kindly. There are few who can equal Præd in delicate thrumming of the light spiritual guitar; and so great a favorite is he in America that four editions of his works have been here published. The one before us is the most complete of all, indeed the only complete one, being a reprint by Widdetou of Moxon's English edition, edited by the Rev. Derwent Coleridge. It contains many poems never before published, together with a memoir of the author. Præd was an orator and essayist as well as a poet. In Parliament he seems to have been distinguished for the same easy grace of expression and ready wit, which characterize his poems and sparkle in his charades. At the early age of thirty-seven, in the very ripeness of his powers, he died, leaving a record behind him which tempts one to speculate as to what he might have achieved had he lived. The present collection of his works is given to the public, under the authority of his two daughters, Helen Adeline Mackworth and Elizabeth Lilian

Mackworth. It has a steel engraving of the author and in typographical beauty reflects great credit upon the American publisher.

The Queens of Song, a reprint by the Harpers of an English work by Ellen Creathorne Clayton, contains memoirs of some of the most celebrated female vocalists who have performed on the lyric stage from the earliest days of opera to the present time, and a chronological list of all the operas that have been performed in Europe. Commencing with Katherine Tofts and Marguerita de l'Epine, the list runs up the gamut of years and song, bringing us down to Catherine Hayes, and Jenny Lind, ending with Louisa Pyne and Teresa Tietjens. It contains portraits of some of the cantratrici, to the fidelity of which we cannot in all instances vouch, though we recognize that of Piccolomini. Of Kate Hayes' experience in California, the book says, "Her success was marvellous; fabulous sums were paid for the choice of seats, and one ticket sold for $1150." At this rate, we do not marvel to learn that she left a fortune of £16,000 at her death, but we mainly doubt if any other singer will ever get such a price for a ticket in this country again. The work is of course interesting, for the lives of some of these children of song were strangely fitful, eventful, and wayward. Our readers will remember an extract from the story of La Maupin's career, which we published a week or two since, showing how, not content with having love made to her by men, she conceived violent attachments for her own sex, making love to them in masculine attire, fighting duels in their behalf, and in one instance scaling convent walls to carry off the object of her passion. Sometimes truth is stranger than fiction.

The author of John Drayton did not find a very taking title for his last work, The Lost Love, reprinted by Peterson, for men are about as apt to turn to lost loves as they are to worry themselves over spilled milk. The scene of the story opens in Scotland, occasionally shifting across the channel among the lost arts and h's; as a novel the book would be better were it less wordy and the action more rapid.

Mrs. H. D. Williams, who has once before appeared as authoress in Voices from the Silent Land, now gives us voices from a chattering land in A Year in China, published by Hurd & Houghton, with an introductory note by William Cullen Bryant. Mr. Bryant says that the author is the wife of our Commissioner at Swatow, and that her accounts of Chinese manners and habits of life bear tokens of the greatest sincerity and conscientiousness. To our thinking, there is a deal of personal detail in them that is not at all interesting and which had much better been avoided. Mrs. Williams, a passenger on the Jacob Bell, was captured with that vessel while homeward bound, by the Florida, and her description of her experience at the hands of Capt. Maffit would scarcely tempt other ladies to be captured. The accusation of pillage, so often brought by the South against Northern soldiers, is hurled back by Mrs. Williams with a double emphasis, telling us that Lieut. Reed pocketed her spoons and carried off silver and other valuables into the wardroom, while another officer helped himself to fans and "things," and still another put on a hoop skirt and capered about the Jacob Bell's deck. Who is black now?

Clever Stories of Many Nations are very well "rendered into rhyme" by John G. Saxe, and the book is very neatly published, with illustrations, by Ticknor & Fields. Mr. Saxe is an easy versifier, and possesses a deep and available fund of humor, though in his contributions to the New York Ledger he very often scraped the bed rock pretty nearly. As we are publishing several of these "clever stories" in THE CALIFORNIAN, as well as selections from Præd's poems, our readers will be enabled to judge of their merits for themselves.

The Treasury of Travel and Adventure is published by Appleton & Co., and claims to be "a book for young and old." We apprehend, however, that it will best suit the young. Its scenes are laid in all quarters and corners of the world, and even California is represented, our Geysers getting favorable mention, and the first discovery of gold and the romance of gold digging coming in for narration and illustration.

"The Country Parson" is out with a new book, of which Ticknor & Fields publish an "author's edition." "The Country Parson" has become pretty well known to both country and city readers through the pages of the Atlantic, where most of these essays have already appeared, as well as from the republication by this firm of other collections of his essays. A very dry fellow is this "Country Parson," shrewd and sensible, telling biting truths in a way that causes them to take hold of follies like pincers, and yet forbids people to cry out. His essay "Concerning Veal" will long be remembered, though occasionally we get tired of his concernings, and wish he would strike a new vein of nomenclature for his articles. It is just possible to have too much of a good thing occasionally. The present volume does not strike us as being equal to his former ones, but for all that it is eminently readable and instructive. The illustration which he draws from the Centrifugal Railway, in the paper "Concerning Needless Fears," is excellent, and will be appreciated by all who saw the Centrifugal Railway on exhibition in this city a year or two since.

DRAMATIC MENTION.

WE are this week cut down in this department to a brevity which is indeed but "mention." The Keans have been playing at the Opera House to crowded audiences, during the week. Mrs. Kean took her farewell benefit on Thursday evening in The Stranger; Mr. Kean will take his on Tuesday evening next as "Sir Edmund Mortimer" in The Iron Chest, and Wednesday evening will be "positively the last appearance these artists will ever make in California." We are glad they came here; sorry they are going; and proud of the fact that they have no reason to complain of California; for their harvest here has been a golden one. Mr. Coppin's "last appearance" was announced for Friday evening, the beneficiary to appear in The School for Scandal, Billy Barlow, and Old Phil's Birthday.

Next week is to be a week of benefits, Frank Mayo giving the public an opportunity to benefit him on Thursday evening. One of the pieces of the occasion will be The Three Guardsmen. Mr. Mayo is a San Francisco actor, he has grown up under the watchful and critical eyes of our audiences, and so in a great manner may be regarded as particularly a California institution. He is a most deserving actor, possessed of no ordinary amount of talent, and by judicious study, is certain to acquire eminence in his profession. He goes East to fill an engagement soon, and we hope that this, his farewell benefit, will be in every respect a substantial one. On Saturday evening, that most sparkling of soubrettes and vivacious of princes and pages, Mrs. Perry, takes a benefit. That it will be an excellent one, nobody doubts, for she has made many friends of late, by striking an unusually good gait in everything she undertook. The St. Andrew's Society, too, take a benefit at the Hippodrome on Tuesday evening. An excellent entertainment will be given.

Everything goes these winter days, and even our minstrels, the sweet William Birch, the pensive Wambold, the jolly Backus, and other merry piping blackbirds are announced as soon to take wing. But the Heron is announced as in flight for that inevitable dramatic perch, the Opera House stage, and beautifully colored bills about town inform us that her first appearance in California in ten years will be made in the following plays: Camille; her own translation and version of Medea; The Queen of the Temple; Mathilde, or The Lone Chateau; Stella, or The Patrician's Feud; The Belle of the Season; Marie de Rohan, or The Duel; and Geraldine. The engagement is for three months only. Edwin Booth, too, is announced as coming, and we hope he is, as his coming would compensate for the going of the Keans. Mrs. Grantly will soon make her début in the Wife. For other dramatic news see advertisements, as at this point space fails us.

THE BLIND MEN AND THE ELEPHANT.

A HINDOO FABLE.

IT was six men of Indostan,
To learning much inclined,
Who went to see the Elephant,
(Though all of them were blind,) That each by observation
Might satisfy his mind.

The First approached the Elephant,
And happening to fall
Against his broad and sturdy side,
At once began to bawl:
"God bless me!—but the Elephant
Is very like a wall!"

The Second, feeling of the tusk,
Cried, "Ho! what have we here
So very round and smooth and sharp?
To me 'tis mighty clear
This wonder of an Elephant
Is very like a spear!"

The Third approached the animal,
And, happening to take
The squirming trunk within his hands,
Thus boldly up and spake:
"I see," quoth he, "the Elephant
Is very like a snake!"

The Fourth reached out his eager hand,
And felt about the knee;
"What most this wondrous beast is like
Is mighty plain," quoth he;
"'Tis clear enough the Elephant
Is very like a tree!"

The Fifth, who chanced to touch the ear,
Said, "E'en the blindest man
Can tell what this resembles most;
Deny the fact who can,
This marvel of an Elephant
Is very like a fan!"

The Sixth no sooner had begun
About the beast to grope,
Than, seizing on the swinging tail
That fell within his scope,
"I see," quoth he, "the Elephant
Is very like a rope!"

And so these men of Indostan
Disputed loud and long,
Each in his own opinion
Exceeding stiff and strong,
Though each was partly in the right,
And all were in the wrong!

MORAL.

So, oft in theologic wars
The disputants, I ween,
Rail on in utter ignorance
Of what each other mean,
And prate about an Elephant
Not one of them has seen!

[John G. Saxe.]

DOCTOR DOBBS AND HIS NAG NOBBS.

[THE power of the extravagant in creating mirth is amply attested by such books as the "Adventures of Baron Munchausen." The following, which we find in an old scrap-book, seems to us as amusing an example of the outrageous as we have ever chanced to light upon.]

DOCTOR Daniel Dobbs, of Doncaster, had a nag that was called Nobbs. One day, in the middle of the winter, the doctor having been summoned to attend a patient at some distance from his dwelling, and being anxious to return home before it was dark, rode poor Nobbs very hard. On his arrival, not finding his man in the way, the doctor fastened Nobbs by his bridle to a rail in the yard, and went into his parlor, where he sat down to warm himself by a good fire. It had happened that in the morning the doctor's dairy-maid had brewed a barrel of strong beer, which had been drawn off into the cooler, and the dairy-maid having been called away to milk her cows, she had carelessly left the door of the brewhouse open. The steam of the beer proved wonderfully inviting to poor Nobbs, who had been hard rode, and now stood in the cold extremely thirsty. After sundry efforts he got loose from the rail, and repairing to the brewhouse, he drank so heartily of the strong beer, that before he was aware of it he fell down dead drunk. The doctor's man coming home, ran into the yard to convey Nobbs to the stable; not finding him at the rail, he looked about, and at length discovered him stretched on the ground, cold and insensible. Bursting into the parlor, where the doctor was sitting with Mrs. Dobbs, he communicated to them the news of poor Nobbs's decease. The doctor and Mrs. Dobbs were both good-natured people, and of course were much concerned; but as the doctor never suffered misfortunes to get the better of his discretion, he immediately gave orders that Nobbs should, without delay, be flayed, and that his skin should be taken the next morning to the currier.

The doctor's man accordingly set to work; poor Nobbs was dragged to the dunghill, his skin was stripped off, and he was left to be eaten by the hounds. He had not, however, lain long before the novelty of his situation had a considerable effect upon him. As he had lost his skin, of course the coldness of the night operated with double activity in dissipating the fumes of the beer which he had swallowed; and at length he awoke, got upon his legs, and trotted away to the stable door, which happened to be close by the parlor. Not finding it open, and being both cold and hungry, he began to whinny for assistance. The doctor and his wife had just done supper, and happened at that moment to be talking of the accident which had befallen their nag, over a hot bowl of brandy punch. No sooner had Nobbs whinnyed, than Mrs. Dobbs turned pale, and exclaimed, "Doctor Dobbs! as sure as I live that is Nobbs's voice; I know him by his whinny!" "My dear," said the doctor, "it is Nobbs's whinny sure enough; but, poor thing, he is dead, and has been flayed." He had hardly said this before Nobbs whinnyed again. Up jumps the doctor, takes a candle in his hand, and runs into the yard; the first thing he saw was Nobbs himself without his skin. The doctor summoned all his servants, ordered six sheep to be killed, and clapped their skins upon poor Nobbs. To make a long story short, Nobbs recovered, and did his work as well as ever. The sheep skins stuck fast, and answered his purpose as well as his own skin ever did. But what is most remarkable, as well as most to our point, the wool grew rapidly; and when the shearing season came, the doctor had Nobbs sheared. Every year he gave the doctor a noble fleece, for he carried upon his back, you know, as much as six sheep; and as long as Nobbs lived, all the doctor's stockings, and all Mrs. Dobbs' flannel petticoats, were made of his wool.

CONTRABAND MUSEUM IN PARIS.

I HAD caught a bad cold, and just as I lifted up my head to sneeze I saw through one of the windows of the mayor's office, in the twelfth arrondissement, the body of a negro hanging by the neck. At the first glance, and even at the second, I took it for a human being whom disappointed love, or perhaps an expeditious justice, had disposed of so suddenly; but I soon ascertained that the ebony gentleman in question was only a kind of doll as large as life. What to think of this I did not know; so I asked the doorkeeper the meaning of it.

"This is the contraband museum," was the answer; and, on my showing a curiosity to examine it, he was kind enough to act as my cicerone.

In a huge dusty room scattered over the floor, on the walls, and along the ceiling, all the inventions of roguery which have been confiscated from time to time by those guardians of the law, the revenue officers. It is a complete arsenal of the weapons of smuggling: all unfortunately in complete confusion. Look before you; there is a hogshead dressed up as a nurse, with a child that holds just two quarts and a half. On the other side are logs, hollow as the Trojan horse, and filled with whole armies of cigars. On the floor lies a huge boa constrictor, gorged with Chinese silks; and just beyond it a pile of coal, curiously perforated with spools of cotton. The colored gentleman who had excited my sympathy so much at first, met with his fate under the following circumstances: He was built of tin, painted black, and stood like a heyduck or Ethiopian chasseur, on the footboard of a carriage, fastened by the feet and hands. He had frequently passed through the gates, and was well known by sight to the soldiers, who noticed that he was always showing his teeth, which they supposed to be the custom of his country. One day the carriage he belonged to was stopped by a crowd at the gate. There was, as usual, a grand chorus of oaths and yells, the vocal part being performed by the drivers and cartmen, and the instrumental by their whips. The negro, however, never spoke a word. His good behavior delighted the soldiers, who held him up as an example to the crowd. "Look at the black fellow," they cried; "see how well he behaves! Bravo, nigger, bravo!" He showed a perfect indifference to their applause. "My friend," said a clerk at the barrier, jumping up on the footboard, and slapping our sable friend on the shoulder, "we are really very much obliged to you!" Oh, surprise! the shoulders rattled. The officer was bewildered: he sounded the footman all over, and found he was a man of metal, and as full as his skin would hold of the very best contraband liquor. The juicy mortal was seized at once, and carried off in triumph. The first night the revenue people drank up one of his shoulders, and he was soon bled to death. It is now six years since he lost all the moisture in his system, and was reduced to a dry skeleton.

How many strange stories these inventions of roguery might tell! Only ask that empty mattress that lies there by the stove. That mattress came from Valenciennes. One morning, two citizens left the town, with swords in hand, and seconds by their side. The solemn mournful gait of their companions indicated clearly the deadly character of the promenade, which took place before the eyes of the revenue officers. The angry principals were so anxious to get to work, that they drew almost as soon as they were beyond the walls. The crossing of their blades, and the clatter of the duel, would easily be noticed from the guard-house. After a desperate contest, the noise ceased. A cry of distress was heard; and if both the contending parties had preserved their honor untouched, the person of one of them could not boast of the same immunity. A wide wound across the forehead, and a scientific thrust into the region of the sternum, which bled profusely, were easily seen. In a moment, a hand-barrow, with the aforesaid mattress upon it, were transformed into a litter, and the procession re-entered the town by the same gate, amidst the sympathies of the guards.

It happened that one of the soldiers had dabbled a little in medicine, and been surgeon's mate in a regiment. He took pity on the wounded man, and followed him home, to offer him his services. This generous behavior won him all hearts in Valenciennes, except those of the seconds, who were at a loss how to get rid of a benefactor whose presence would be so fatal to the success of their daring fraud. At last, the most ingenious of them took the soldier aside, and begged him to wait a few moments in another room, till he got the sick man ready to receive his disinterested physician. The surgeon-soldier readily agreed to this; the friend availed himself of the interval, and whispered in the patient's ear, as he lay on the mattress, "We are lost!"

"Sacrebleu! and why?" asked the wounded man.

"Speak lower! one of the custom-house guards wants to dress your wounds."

"My wounds? he shant do it—I want to keep them as they are, and you go and tell him so."

"He won't believe it," was the answer.

"But suppose I don't want to be cured? I presume I am my own master, and besides, I have a reason for it."

"I know that, but the fool will insist on it."

"He may go to the deuce; I'll jump out of the window first."

"Why, you wretch, we shall be ruined."

"What of it? I wish I had really been badly wounded, I give you my word for it."

"Alas! I'm afraid it's the only way to get out of this scrape."

"Much obliged to you."

"If you only would"—

"Well, what?"

"It's time enough yet, perhaps"—

"Well?"

"The wife of Brutus, on a like occasion, inflicted a desperate wound on herself."

"What have I got to do with that?"

"Don't you understand, my dear friend?"

"Ah, horrible! I shudder at the thought. You are so fond of me, that you are very willing to shed my blood"—and the frightened patient raised himself up in bed.

"Come, come, try to be reasonable."

"You are troublesome: do you think I'm going to throw away my life to serve you—think of something else. I should like very much to oblige you—but in such a way—never! I'd die first."

"Only think what it is you object to—only two little wounds—if they only look natural, it's all sufficient. Come, my dear fellow, say you agree to it."

"I tell you again and again, I won't."

"Come, now, be clever, I've an easy hand, and the surgeon will be tired waiting."

"I suppose you think it will be fine fun for me."

"Oh what a fuss you make about a couple of little scratches! If kindness and friendship cannot touch your obstinate heart, let's see what force will do." And thereupon the friend seized his sword; the patient dodged the first blow, leaped to his feet, snatched up the other weapon, and attacked his aggressor furiously. The soldier, hearing the scuffle, rushed into the room, and succeeded, not without trouble, in separating the combatants, when he found, to his great surprise, that it was not the sham patient that needed help, but his friend, till now safe and sound, whom the dying man had pinked just below the thorax.

"I thought," said the soldier, "that these gentlemen were too polite to give me all the trouble of coming for nothing." The wounded man was soon cured, and the mattress, stuffed full of English goods, well repaid the soldier for his medical services.—From the French.

THE inventor of chronometer watches was John Harrison, an Englishman, who went to London in 1728 at the age of thirty-five. Parliament having offered a reward of £20,000 for some mode of ascertaining the longitude of a ship at sea, young Harrison, who was a carpenter's son, set to work. He thought when he visited London that he had perfected a work that would do it, but after consulting Graham, the celebrated mathematical instrument maker, he returned to his country house and in seven years returned to London, with the first chronometer. He received the reward, after its accuracy had been tested by his son, who made the voyage to Canada in order to verify its correctness.

The Florence Sewing Machine

Work done on the FLORENCE have taken all the First Premiums awarded to Sewing Machines and Machine work at the Fairs of California in 1864.

Read the report of the Committee on Sewing Machines at the great Industrial Exhibition of the Mechanics' Institute:

THE FLORENCE.—We have given this new Sewing Machine a careful and minute examination. Its simple and finished mechanical construction, and the obvious adaptability of each part to its work, has been to us an interesting study. It differs essentially from other Sewing Machines, having many new and peculiar features. It makes four kinds of stitch, each alike on both sides of the fabric, has a reversible feed motion, and sews any thickness of goods without change of tension. We consider the "FLORENCE" a decided improvement in sewing mechanism.

AN UNMITIGATED HUMBBUG!

The Agent of a certain Sewing Machine evidently intends, by humbug and deception, to foist his wares upon the public, instead of endeavoring by the merit of the article (if it possesses any) to attain an honorable position among those so well and favorably known. He advertises thus:

"The FLORENCE Machine, and work done on the FLORENCE, have taken ALL THE FIRST PREMIUMS awarded to Sewing Machines and Machine Work at the Fairs of California in 1864."

That the ambiguity of the insinuation contained above may deceive no one, we would say that ALL the Fairs in California in 1864, at which ANY premium has been awarded, is ONE—the Mechanics', just closed, whose official Report reads thus:

"Sewing Machines.—Premium to the Florence, no competition." This is the OVERWHELMING success which has attended the FLORENCE Machine at "ALL the Fairs in California in 1864."

And again the Report reads thus:

"Machine Sewing.—Premium to Mrs. Nancy Barton."

As the FLORENCE Machine claims the first premium on Machine Work, and we do not "see it in that light," we publish the following from Mrs. Barton:

SAN FRANCISCO, October 7th, 1864.
The Machine Sewing for which I received the First Premium at the Mechanics' Institute Fair was executed on the GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINE, which style I have had in constant use for five or six years, and consider superior to all others.

So the FLORENCE Machine, with NO COMPETITION, did obtain a Premium on the Machine, and DID NOT obtain ANY Premium on Machine Work as claimed. Even the "Card" published as a COMMITTEE REPORT loses in a slight degree its importance, as follows:

Extract from the signatures on "Committee Report," published by the FLORENCE Agent.

"O. C. WHEELER, who has been on more SEWING MACHINE Committees than any other person in California."

THE SEWING MACHINE WAR.

Mr Wheeler writes thus:

"* * * A gentleman called at my office at a time when I was exceedingly busy, and asked me to append my name to a report which he held in his hand on Sewing Machines, then exhibiting at the 'Industrial Fair of the Mechanics' Institute' in this city. I said, 'I have no knowledge of being on a Committee, and have made no examination.' He informed me that as the FLORENCE was the only Machine on exhibition, and had no competition, an examination was unnecessary. I then wrote my name and he left."

I WOULD NOT have served on a Committee or signed any report had there been any competition, for the reason that my family have used the GROVER & BAKER Machine for several years, and would be unwilling to change it for any other.

I do not remember having ever served on a Committee or signed a report on Sewing Machines before. The statement that I have "served on more Sewing Machine Committees than any other person in California" is therefore untrue and wholly unauthorized.

O. C. WHEELER.
San Francisco, October 7th, 1864.

Thus the advertisement of the FLORENCE agent from first to last, is a humbug, and nothing else.

The only Fair on the Pacific Coast where the FLORENCE Machine has been exhibited in competition for a Premium against others was at the Oregon State Fair, in September, where it was essentially defeated, and two First Premiums awarded GROVER & BAKER for best Sewing Machine and Machine Sewing.

REPLY TO

THE UNMITIGATED HUMBBUG!

CARD OF R. G. BROWN.

A new Sewing Machine, recently introduced on this Coast, having taken all the honors awarded to Sewing Machines and Sewing Machine Work by the Fairs of California in 1864, an agent for one of the old established Machines, evidently worried, endeavors by ridicule and the charge of humbug to hide from the eyes of the public the magnitude of the victories achieved by this new comer.

The FLORENCE and the Work done on the FLORENCE, have taken five First Premiums instead of one, as would be inferred from the statement of the agent of the Grover & Baker Machine, and no greater triumph could be desired for the FLORENCE than the fact that it had "no competition" at a Fair like the Grand Industrial Exhibition of the Mechanics' Institute just closed, held, too, in San Francisco, where nearly every description of Sewing Machine in the known world is represented.

If Mrs. Nancy Barton intends in her note to claim the Premium on Machine Sewing at the late Mechanics' Fair, she has made a great mistake, as the Premium was awarded to work done on the FLORENCE.

The "Sun Bonnet" on which she took a Premium was classed with Fancy Needlework, and was not examined by the Committee on Sewing Machine Work.

From Mr. O. C. Wheeler's statement some have incorrectly inferred that his signature was obtained by some party interested in or connected with the FLORENCE. The Committee were chosen in the usual manner, and we supposed Mr. Wheeler, as one of them, did his duty properly. If his time would not admit of this, it would have been more satisfactory to all concerned had he declined to serve.

From the above, which we are prepared to substantiate to the letter, it will be seen that the FLORENCE advertisement, which the Grover & Baker agent calls an unmitigated humbug was true in every particular, excepting the statement that Mr. Wheeler had been on other Sewing Machine Committees. His connection with the State Fairs as Secretary making it necessary for him to have much to do with Sewing Machines and Sewing Machine Committee reports, led to this very natural mistake; while the notice of the Grover & Baker agent, to which he gives so appropriate a heading, contains many misstatements and ambiguously worded "Cards" that are liable to be misconstrued.

General Agent Florence Sewing Machines,

(October 22.)

THOSE

SEWING MACHINE PREMIUMS AGAIN!

The "Reply" of the Agent of the FLORENCE Machine is fluent with such aspiring words as "Triumphs," "Victories," "Honors," and the like, which, as applied to any events in the history of that Machine, are simply ridiculous.

The "magnitude" of the "victories" attained by the FLORENCE is apparent to none but himself. Show them up, Mr. Hill; give the public an opportunity of realizing the vastness of "all the honors" conferred in so lavish a manner.

Show them if you can, and name any premium your Machine has ever received at any Fair over any first, second, or third-class machine in existence!

Perhaps it was an "honor" to exhibit against the GROVER & BAKER Machine at the Oregon State Fair, just closed, where Two First Premiums were awarded the GROVER & BAKER over the Florence. Will Mr. Hill name any first premium his Machine has ever received for Sewing Machine work in competition with others?

THE SEWING MACHINE WAR.

The unequivocal "triumph" of the Florence Machine at the Mechanics' Institute Fair, and its single specimen of sewing at the Stockton Fair—without competition in either case—is certainly tremendous.

"A contented mind is a continual feast." As you say you desire no greater triumph for the Florence than the fact that it had no competition at the Mechanics' Fair, allow us to congratulate you on so readily attaining your desires. All the honors of this bloodless "Victory" undoubtedly are yours, and, as we do not deny it, we trust your laurels may rest easily on your triumphant brow.

Your complete satisfaction in such a result, where there was no competition, and by the rules of the Society the Exhibitors were allowed to select their own Committees, will be more fully appreciated by a sympathizing public in consideration of the immense risk and great danger in which you stood of being defeated (?) by your selected Committee of interested friends and owners of the Florence Machine. Advertise your single-handed "Victories," proclaim your undivided "Honors"—make much of your one-sided "Triumphs," unequalled in their overwhelming (?) "magnitude," but until you can strengthen them by a conquest over some third, second, or first-class Machine, they will be but as sound and fury—signifying nothing.

The Grover & Baker is the only First Premium Sewing Machine, having received every First Premium awarded any Sewing Machines when in competition, in 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864.

Having heard to-day for the first time that the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company claim

THE SEWING MACHINE WAR.

the First Premium on Sewing Machines and Sewing Machine Work at the Oregon State Fair, held in Salem, September, 1864, and being one of the Committee on Sewing Machines and Sewing Machine Work at said Fair, I feel it my duty to make, and take pleasure in making the following statement:

Three (if not all) of the Committee were selected by a Mr. Johnson, (an employe of the Grover & Baker Company,) and after a careful examination of the Sewing Machines and Machine Work on exhibition, and a long consultation, it was finally decided and agreed by the Committee, to award the First Premium to the FLORENCE Machine as the best Machine for doing all grades of work, and a Premium to the Grover & Baker Machine for embroidery; and the Committee reported such decision to the President of the Fair, Judge Thornton, who wrote out the report and read it to the Committee, as above stated, four of whom signed it without reading it, the other member of the Committee having been called away. The above is a true statement of the views of the Committee and their final decision.

MARY A. HOWE.

STATE OF OREGON, } ss.
County of Multnomah,

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned, a Notary Public in and for said County and State, Mary A. Howe, who, being first duly sworn, says the above statement is true, as she verily believes.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my notarial seal, this 4th day of November, 1864.
(Notarial Seal.) J. N. DOLPH,
Notary Public, Multnomah County, Oregon.

STATE OF OREGON, } ss.
County of Linn,

I have read the above statement, (I being one of the Committee mentioned,) and the same is true to the best of my knowledge and belief.

EMILY C. GRIFFIN.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 13th day of December, 1864.

JAMES ELKINS,
County Clerk, Linn County, Oregon.

I was one of the five ladies comprising the Committee for the examination of Sewing Machines at the late Oregon State Fair, and am the party referred to above as having been called away before signing our Report. I hereby say that the above statements are true as to the decision of the Committee.

MARY MILLER.

Albany, Oregon, December 13th, 1864.

Copy of the Bogus Report which was fraudulently substituted in the place of the Real Decision of the Committee, and which they signed without reading:

SEPTEMBER 29th, 1864.

We, the undersigned, a Committee appointed at the Fourth Annual Fair of the Oregon State Agricultural Society to examine and report upon the merits of different Sewing Machines on exhibition, have endeavored to perform the duty with care and impartiality. In view of all the facts, we have decided to award the First Premium to the Grover & Baker Machine, and the Second to the Florence. The principal fact influencing our decision in awarding the First Premium to the former, was the circumstance that it embroidered, while the other does not. We have, however, no hesitancy in saying that both have great merits, and we recommend them both to the patronage of the Oregon public.

AFTER-YEARS.

CHILDHOOD, the fairest dawning of the day;
The rarest hour, when, as the light appears,
The eyes first open to the wondrous play
Of marvellous beauties, night is far away—
Age is the night of years.

Youth follows childhood, when as higher climbs
The flame of life, the blazing noontide nears;
The heart is joyous, love is full of rhymes
Like merry bells that ring in happy chimes—
Age is the night of years.

Then manhood, glorious in fair array
Of good intentions, never thought of fears
Can penetrate his mail, so is the way
All open to him, and his step is gay—
Age is the night of years.

Lastly the after-twilight of the hours,
And pause reluctant at the vale of tears;
The flickering of the light, the vanished powers,
The failing spirit as the darkness lowers—
Age is the night of years,
The night of years.

CHARLES WARREN STODDARD.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 28, 1865.

FINALE OF "THE LITTLE FRENCHMAN AND HIS WATER LOTS."—Relative to the story of the Poopoo property, published in last week's CALIFORNIAN, a correspondent writes us as follows:

"Do you know the finale of the 'Little Frenchman and his Water Lots?' Pertinax (his real name) went to Paris and died broken hearted, in about 1840. Along in '58 an agent of his heirs found out that that part of Williamsburgh in which his lots were, had grown immensely, and that a large ship building concern was located immediately in the rear of the Frenchman's water front; that they had a number of vessels on the stocks and one large ship ready for launching. He procured an injunction stopping the launch, but concluded to take sixty thousand dollars for the water lots."

We are obliged to "Veritas" for this communication, since it may go far towards easing the minds of those who hold mining shares, petroleum lands, or water lots in this vicinity, of apprehension. The little Frenchman invested, and broke his heart over the purchase. The story of his experiment was written to show the folly of speculators. But in the end the water lots which he deprecated and at which others laughed, made his heirs wealthy. So let not those who hold unprofitable property despair, but put it away on a shelf and bide their time. Probably, many a man who is now groaning over his assessments upon stock which he considers hopelessly bad, may at some time ride in his carriage from the income its monthly dividends will bring him. Nil Desperandum, or, in the expressive language of the vernacular, Don't lose your grip!

THE trial trip of the Cumanche to Mare Island, on Saturday last, proved a perfect success, notwithstanding the ill luck which befell that vessel in the beginning and seemed destined to attend her to the end. Her engine worked beautifully, driving her through the water even under the disadvantageous circumstances of an ebb tide and a slight head breeze, at an average speed of about six and a half miles an hour. The wharves and the hills about the city were crowded with people, eager to witness the outlines of their protector, and the reverence with which they regarded her was evidenced by the cheers which rent the air, steamers firing salutes, blowing their whistles and dipping their flags in honor as she passed—courtesies which the Cumanche returned as a General might the salute of corporals, by a flourish of her flag and a stately bend of her head. While passing the wharves the turret was made to revolve, in order to show how the naval engagements she might possibly be obliged to contract, would be maintained; people involuntarily started as the ominous port-holes, with their grim staring guns were brought to bear upon them. Probably one hundred and fifty guests accompanied the vessel upon this trial trip, doing such ample justice to the excellent lunch provided for the occasion, that there was not even a turkey-bone left. The trip was made without the occurrence of a single accident, the passengers being brought back to this city by the Shubrick, which accompanied the Cumanche for that purpose, in view of the fact that the vessel was to be turned over to the Government authorities at Mare Island. The contractors, Messrs. Donahue, Ryan and Setor, deserve great praise for the energy and fidelity they have displayed in the speedy and skilful construction of this harbor defence; and Mr. Ryan was enabled to take his departure for the East in the steamer of the following Monday, happy in the consciousness that at last a marine elephant was off his and his fellow contractors' hands, and successfully afloat.

DURING the riots of 1780, most persons in London, in order to save their houses from being burnt or pulled down, wrote on their doors, "No Popery!" Old Grimaldi, the father of the celebrated "Joey," to avoid all mistakes, wrote on his "No Religion!"

GOSSIP.

[THE following essay we take from "The Country Parson's" new book, Autumn Holidays. It was not selected with any special reference to this climate, though it does now occur to us that it is quite as well adapted for publication and dissemination in California as in any other part of the world.]

WHO invents the current lies? I suppose a multitude of people give each their little contribution, till the piece of malignant tattle is formed into shape.

There are many people, claiming to be very religious people, who are very willing to repeat a story to the prejudice of some one they know, though they have very little reason to think it true, and having strong suspicions that it is false. There is a lesser number of respectable people, who will positively invent and retell a story to the prejudice of some one they know, being well aware that it is false. In short, most people who repeat ill-natured stories may be arranged in these two classes:

1. People who lie.
2. People who lie, and know they lie.

The intelligent reader is requested to look upon the words which follow, and then he will be informed about a malicious, vulgar, and horribly stupid piece of gossip:

MR. AND MRS. GREEN

ALWAYS

DRESS FOR DINNER.

My friend Mr. Green lately told me, that quite by accident he found that in the little country town where he lives, and of which indeed he is the vicar, it had come to be generally reported that in every bedroom in his house a framed and glazed placard was hung above the mantelpiece, bearing the above inscription. Miss Tarte and Mr. Fatuous had eagerly disseminated the rumor, though it was impossible to say who had originated it. Probably Miss Tarte had one day said to Mr. Fatuous that Mr. Green ought to have such a placard so exhibited, and that some day Mr. Green probably would come to have such a placard so exhibited. A few days afterwards Mr. Fatuous said to Miss Tarte that he supposed Mr. Green must have his placards up by this time. And next day, on the strength of that statement, Miss Tarte told a good many people that the placards were actually up. And the statement was willingly received and eagerly repeated by those persons in that town who are always delighted to have something to tell which shows that any one they know has done something silly or bad. At last a friend of Mr. Green's thought it right he should know what Mr. Fatuous and Miss Tarte were saying. And Mr. Green, who is a resolute person, took means to cut these individuals short. My friend has exactly one spare bedroom in his house, and no one who is not an idiot need be told that no such inscription was ever displayed or ever dreamt of in his establishment. Next Sunday Mr. Green preached a sermon from the text, Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor. And after pointing out that it was unnecessary that the commandment should forbid false witness to the advantage of one's neighbor, inasmuch as nobody was likely ever to bear that, he went on to point out, with great force of argument, that if man or woman habitually told lies to the prejudice of their neighbors, their Christian character might justly be held as an imperfect one, even though they should attend all the week day services and missionary society meetings within several miles. Mr. Fatuous and Miss Tarte complained that this was very unsound doctrine. And Miss Tarte wrote a letter to the Record, in which she stated that the vicar habitually preached the doctrines of Bishop Colenso.

One is most unwilling to believe it, yet I am compelled by the logic of facts to think that malice towards all their fellow-creatures is an essential part of the constitution of many people. All the particles of matter, we know, exert on each other a mutual repulsion. Is it so with the atoms that make up human society? Many people dislike a man just because they know nothing about him. And when they come to know something about him, they are sure to dislike him even more. In a simple state of society, if you dislike a man you would knock him on the head. If an Irishman you would shoot him from behind a hedge. The modern civilized means of wreaking your wrath on the man you dislike is different. You repeat tattle to his prejudice. You tell lies about him. This is the weapon of warfare in Christian countries. Two things there are the wise man will not trust, if said by various persons we all know:

1. Anything to their own advantage.
2. Anything to their neighbor's prejudice.

It is a bad sign of human nature, that many men should have so much to say to the prejudice of any one they know. But it is a much worse sign of human nature that many men should hear with delight, and speak with exaggeration, anything to the prejudice of people whom they know nothing about. The man you know may have given you offence. The man of whom you know nothing cannot possibly have done so; and if you hate him, and wish to do him harm, it can only be because you are prepared to hate the average specimen of your race. We all know those who, if they met a fellow-creature out in the lonely desert, would see in him not a friend but an enemy, and would prepare to shoot him or hamstring him unobserved. For the people I mean prefer to deal their blow unseen. There are those who, as boys at school, would never have a fair fight with a companion, but would secretly give him a malicious poke when unobserved. And such men, I have remarked, carry out the system when they have reached maturity. They will not boldly face the being they hate, but they secretly disseminate falsehoods to his disadvantage.

But it is sad to think that the hasty judgments men form of one another are almost invariably unfavorable ones. It is sad to think that people come to have such malignant feeling towards other people who are quite unknown to them. A short time ago, at a public meeting, Mr. Jones was proposed as a suitable person to be the town beadle. Jones did not want the beadleship, being already in possession of a preferable situation of the same character. When his name was proposed, an old individual rose to oppose him. That was all natural. But this individual was not content to oppose Jones's claims to the beadleship, he positively gnashed his teeth in fury at Jones. He had no command of language, and could but imperfectly express his hatred; but he foamed at the mouth, the veins of his head swelled up, and he trembled in every limb with eager wrath, as he declared that he would never consent to Jones being beadle: that if Jones was appointed beadle he himself (his name was Mr. Curre) would forthwith quit the town, and never again enter it. Curre had never exchanged a word with Jones in all his life; yet he hated Jones, and the mention of Jones's name thus infuriated him, even as a scarlet rag a bull. Poor Curre was not a bad-hearted fellow after all, and at a subsequent period Jones made his acquaintance. Now, one great principle Jones holds by is this, that if any man hate you, it must be in some measure your own fault; you must in some way have given offence to the man. So Jones, who is a very genial and straightforward person, asked Curre to tell him honestly why he had so keenly opposed his appointment to the beadleship, adding that he feared he had given Curre offence in some way or other, though he had never intended it; and Curre, after some hesitation and with a good deal of shame, replied, "Well, the fact is, I could not bear to see you riding such a fine horse, and Mr. Sneakyman told me you paid a hundred and twenty pounds for it." "My friend Curre," was the reply, "I gave just forty for that horse, and how could you believe anything said by Sneakyman?" Curre assured Jones that the reason why he had disliked him was just that he knew so little of him, and that when he came to know him his dislike immediately passed into a real warm and penitent regard. And when Curre died soon after, he left Jones ten thousand pounds. Curre had no relations, so it was all right; and Jones had nineteen children, so it was all right for him too.

Reader, take a large sheet of paper—foolscap paper.

Take a pen. Sit down at a table where there is ink.

Write out a list of all the persons you dislike, adding a brief statement of the reason or reasons why you dislike each of them.

Having written accordingly, ask yourself this question: Am I doing well to be angry with these persons? Have they given me offence to justify this dislike?

And now listen to this prophecy. You will be obliged to confess that they have not. You will feel ashamed of your dislike for them. You will resolve to cease disliking them.

Believe one who has tried. Here on this table is a large foolscap page. Three names did I write down of people I disliked; then I wrote down the cause why I disliked the first, and it looked, being written down, so despicably small, that I felt heartily ashamed. And now, you large page, go into the fire; and with you these dislikes shall perish. At this moment I don't dislike any human being, and if anybody dislikes me I hope he will cease doing so. If ever I gave him offence, I am sorry for it.

Yet I cannot quite agree with Jones in thinking that, in every case where dislike is felt, it is at least in part the fault of the disliked person. In many cases it is: not in all. A retired oilman of large wealth bought a tract of land, and went to reside on it. He found that his parish clergyman drove a handsome carriage, and had a couple of men-servants. The old oilman was infuriated. The clergyman's wife erected a conservatory: the oilman had an epileptic fit. Now all this was entirely the oilman's own fault. A retired officer went to live in a certain rural district. He dined at six o'clock. Several people round, who dined at five, took mortal offence. O for the abolition of white slavery! When will human beings be suffered to do as they please?

I have remarked, too, that most stupid people hate all clever people. I have witnessed a very weak and silly man repeat, with a fatuous and feeble malignity, like a dog without teeth trying to bite, some story to the prejudice of an eminent man in the same profession. And even worse: you may find such a man repeat a story not at all to the disadvantage of the eminent man, under the manifest impression that it is to his disadvantage. I have rarely heard Mr. Snarling say anything with more manifest malignity, than when he said that my friend Smith had bought a fire-proof safe in which to keep his sermons. Well, was there any harm in that? "Bedwell said he would take nothing under the chancellorship," said Mr. Dunup. Perhaps Bedwell should not have said so; but the fact proved to be that he got the chancellorship.

Clergymen of little piety or ability, and with empty churches, dislike those clergymen whose churches are very full. You may discern this unworthy feeling exhibited in a hundred pitiful, spiteful little ways. I have remarked, too, that the emptier a man's church grows, the higher becomes his doctrine. And flagrant practical neglect of duty is in some cases compensated by violent orthodoxy, the orthodoxy being shown mainly by accusing other people of heterodoxy.

Unworthy people hate those who do a thing better than themselves. An inefficient rector empties his church. He gets a popular curate who fills it. The parishioners present the curate with a piece of plate. Forthwith the rector dismisses the curate. Or perhaps the rector dare not venture on that. He waits till the curate gets a parish of his own; and then he diligently excludes him from the pulpit whence his sermons were so attractive. His old friends shall never see or hear him again, if the rector can prevent it. And further, the rector and his wife disseminate wretched little bits of scandal as to the extravagant sayings and doings of the curate, all exaggerated and mostly invented.

The heroic way of taking gossip is that in which the old Earl Marischals took it, when it was a more serious thing than now. Above the door of each of their castles, there were written on the stone these words:

THEY HAIF SAID :
WHAT SAID THEY?
LAT THEM SAY!

WIT AND HUMOR.

A LADY the other day meeting a girl who had lately left her service, inquired, "Well, Mary, where do you live now?" "Please ma'am, I don't live nowhere now," rejoined the girl, "I'm married!"

"WHAT plan," said one actor to another, "shall I adopt to fill the house at my benefit?" "Invite your creditors," was the surly reply.

OWEN Moore has run away,
Owing more than he can pay.

"HURRAH! hurrah!" cried a young lawyer, who had succeeded to his father's practice, "I've settled that old Chancery suit at last." "Settled it!" cried the astonished parent, "why I gave you that as an annuity for your life."

CURRAN, hearing that a stingy and slovenly barrister had started for the Continent with a shirt and a guinea, observed, "He'll not change either till he comes back."

"WELL, sir," asked a noisy disputant, "don't you think that I have mauled my antagonist to some purpose?" "O, yes," replied a listener, "you have—and if ever I should happen to fight with the Philistines, I'll borrow your jawbone."

AN "old clo'" man condemned to be hanged, was brought to the gallows, and was on the point of being turned off, when a reprieve arrived. When informed of this, it was expected he would instantly have quitted the cart, but he stayed to see a fellow-prisoner hanged; and being asked why he did not get about his business, he said, he waited to see if he could bargain with Mr. Ketch for the other gentleman's clothes.

A LECTURER, wishing to explain to a little girl the manner in which a lobster casts his shell when he has out-grown it, said: "What do you do when you have out-grown your clothes? You throw them aside, don't you?" "Oh, no," replied the little one, "we let out the tucks!" The doctor confessed she had the advantage of him there.

WHEN Lord B—— died, a person met an old man who was one of his most intimate friends. He was pale, confused, awe-stricken. Every one was trying to console him, but in vain. "His loss," he exclaimed, "does not affect me so much as his horrible ingratitude. Would you believe it? he died without leaving me anything in his will—I, who have dined with him, at his own house, three times a week for thirty years!"

A roon but clever student in the University of Glasgow, was met by one of the Professors, who noticing the scantiness of his academical toga, said, "Mr. —, your gown is very short." It will be long enough, sir, before I get another," replied the student. The answer tickled the Professor greatly, and he went on quietly chuckling to himself, when he met a brother Professor who, noticing his hilarity, inquired what was amusing him so much. "Why, that fellow — said such a funny thing. I asked why his gown was so short, and he said, 'it will be a long time before I get another!'" "There's nothing very funny in that." "Well, no," replied the other, "there is not, after all. But it was the way he said it."

A WOMAN having fallen into a river, her husband went to look for her, proceeding up the stream from the place where she fell in. The bystanders asked him if he was mad—she could not have gone against the stream. The man answered, "She was obstinate and contrary in her life, and no doubt she was the same at her death."

WIT ON TOMBSTONES.

A VAST amount of wit is to be gathered from tombstones, and mortuary puns have long been famous. The epitaph of the witty divine, Dr. Thomas Fuller, is worthy of himself, simply Fuller's earth.

There is a professional point in the epitaph of the eminent barrister, Sir John Strange:

Here lies an honest lawyer—that is strange.

And by what an outrageous quibble has the name of Wm. Burton, Esq., been handed down to immortality. The epitaph is to be seen in a churchyard near Salisbury:

O sun, moon, stars, and ye celestial poles!
Are graves, then, dwindled into Burton holes?

There is something quaint and touching in this epitaph of Grimaldi, the distinguished clown:

Here I am!

One of the best of this briefer kind was proposed by Jerrold, whose wit did not always wear so courteous a dress. Charles Knight, the Shakspearian critic, was the subject, and the words—

Good Knight.

Professional rivalry produced this ill-natured inscription for the tombstone of a Western editor:

Here lies an editor.

It is added that the injured man recommended the author to use the inscription as a motto for his own journal.

Of histrionic epitaphs the best is this one on one of Shakspeare's actors:

Exit Burbage.

In a similar vein a wit gave a couplet to Mrs. Oldfield, the most celebrated actress of her day:

This we must own, in justice to her shade,
The first bad exit Oldfield ever made.

Something of compliment is here sacrificed to make the point. It is the reverse of Malcolm's Enlogy on Cawdor:

Nothing in his life
Became him like the leaving of it.

The comedian Foote takes his turn thus:

Foote from his earthly stage, alas! is hurled;
Death took him off, who took off all the world.

Westminster Abbey has some notable epitaphs. This, by Samuel Wesley, is on the monument to Butler, the author of Hudibras:

When Butler, needy wretch! was still alive,
No generous patron would a dinner give,
See him, when starved to death and turned to dust
Presented with a monumental bust!
The poet's fate is here in emblem shown:
He asked for bread and received but a stone.

This couplet, on a monument to John Gay, the poet, Thackeray's "Little French Abbe," is hardly suited to a Christian church:

Life is jest, and all things show it,
I thought so once, and now I know it.

And what a defiance there is in this, on the monument of that "gallant soldier, Sir Thomas Vere:"

When Vere sought death, armed with his sword and shield,
Death was afraid to meet him in the field;
But when his weapons he had laid aside,
Death like a coward, struck him, and he died.

Sir Thomas Perkins, the great wrestler, caused a monument to be built for himself on which was a sculpture in relief, depicting Death in the act of throwing Sir Thomas. The epitaph, which is in Latin, reads as follows:

Here lies the chief, who once threw all,
Thrown by the conquering arm of death,
Who ne'er had given the knight a fall,
But that he found him out of breath.
But boast not, Death! with empty pride,
Thy strength: the day will come when he
Arising, with fresh breath supplied,
Shall vanquish Time, and conquer thee.

Miss Long was a beautiful actress of the last century, so short in stature that she was known as the pocket Venus. Her epitaph concludes:

Though long, yet short,
Though short, yet Pretty Long.

Bancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury, was a covetous man, and this pasquinading epitaph was put on him:

Here lies his Grace, in cold clay clad,
Who died for want of what he had.

The reverse of this is one on Mr. James Worsdale, a very liberal man:

Eager to get, but not to keep the pelf;
A friend to all mankind, but not himself.

We close our list with a pathetic inscription placed by an honest Illinois farmer over the double grave of a span of favorite horses, struck down by lightning, and buried in his front yard:

Peace to their manes.

SOME one being asked if a certain authoress, whom he had long known, was not "a little tiresome." "Not at all," replied he, "she was perfectly tiresome."

CHAPTER XII.—CONTINUED.

A MODERN GENTLEMAN'S DIARY.

"DECEMBER 10.—Yes; the dismal confession must be written, or the account between R. L. and self closed forever. I am in love—seriously, desperately, unreasonably in love—with a young person whose social status is something between that of a parlor-maid and a nursery governess. Could she be worse off than she is now? Could any turn in the wheel of fortune leave her in a lower place than she now occupies? Scarcely! I don't believe in those dismal histories which the Minerva press was wont to disseminate. Susan is just the sort of girl to fall on her feet. Those shy, sensitive creatures always know how to take care of themselves, and often do remarkably well in life. It's your dashing, high-spirited, strong-minded girl who goes to the bad. Goodness knows I'm not a bad-hearted fellow. I can't look at such a girl as Susan without worrying myself about her future career. There's scarcely any sacrifice I wouldn't make—short of the sacrifice of my own prospects—in order to insure her welfare. Yes, the little stranger, let into my dwelling unawares, has strung his bow and twanged his arrow home to my heart. I am really in love this time. I used to feel savage with those St. B. fellows when they talked nonsense to Rosa; but I think I should annihilate the man who so much as looked at this girl. Yes; I am prepared to make any sacrifice—short of the destruction of my own prospects. Your really rich man or your penniless beggar can afford to make a fool of himself; but I stand just in that middle distance between the golden lands of plenty and the sterile plains of poverty, in which a man must needs be peculiarly circumspect.

"17th.—I have broken the ice at last. What a little Puritan she is! And yet I know that she loves me, with the regular Haidée or Zuleika sort of devotion: would like to kneel at my feet, and offer me tiresome flowers when I was absorbed in the classic fogies, and all that sort of thing. A long interview on the esplanade this afternoon. I beat the ground with the greatest discretion, for it would have been the easiest thing in the world to frighten her. It must be a marriage—a bona fide marriage—secret, of course. She won't object to that. But upon the other point I can see she would be inflexible. Those quiet people are always obstinate. Ay di me, my pretty Susie, I fear that you and I must say Good-by. And I am really over head and ears in that dismal pit. I am most absurdly fond of her; that's the worst of it. Yes, we must say Good-by. The catechisms in the rector's parlor and the Sunday-school have done their work, and Susan Turner will be a drudge all her life rather than surrender those ridiculous prejudices which it is the fashion of complaint in the minds of rustic youth. Addio, my pretty Susan. I cannot imagine anything more delightful than our quiet walks in the cold gray twilight; I cannot conceive any eyes—out of a Murillo—so beautiful as those brown orbs of yours—obrs is the proper phrase, I think, where a fellow is sentimental—but the price demanded is too heavy. One may buy gold in too dear a market; and ten years hence, with blighted prospects, and half a dozen children, I might grow tired of my white doe of what's-its-name, and I fancy a blue-eyed Greuze—how wonderful that man was in his manipulation of violet-hued pupils swimming in enamelled whiteness!—instead of my Murillo

"20th.—I began to pack my books the day before yesterday, and yet I linger. 'Tell me, my heart, if this be love?' Not much doubt about it, I fear. But only a day or two more, and then—and then good-by, pretty, Puritanical Susan, with your Sunday school morality, and all that innate obstinacy peculiar to quiet women. I shall have forgotten her in six weeks, I dare say. But then that consolatory idea of the future oblivion won't lessen the present anguish of parting. We may forget all about a gigantic triple-pronged carious tooth when we turn our back upon the dentist's torture-chamber, but the pang of extraction is none the less. I shall forget her, and some other eyes will haunt me in my sleep; but there must be a long blank interval of weariness before the Lethean waters can wash away that artless face. I have plumbed her simple mind to its uttermost depths, and have found nothing like deception or pretence. So we must part. I to go forth and do my best at opening the great oyster; she to remain here as my landlady's drudge and companion. Poor little thing! I hope she'll miss me when I go. I shouldn't like to think of her enjoying a flirtation with some new lodger, a city clerk, who would wear ready-made clothes bought somewhere in Shoreditch, and smoke cheap manillas. No, I shouldn't like to fancy her happy when I am gone. It wouldn't have been pleasant to the Corsair to imagine Medora flirting with mercantile mariners in his absence.

"21st.—I have packed all my books, except a few German eribs. Perhaps it was as well, for my studies had grown very desultory. How can a fellow read hard when there is a pretty girl in the case, and he has been so profound an idiot as to fall in love with her? But 'it is written,' as the followers of the prophet observe, and I must go. I have told Susan. We had a very affecting interview yesterday. How the poor little girl cried! and I hate to see a woman cry; it's so excruciating to the feelings of a good-hearted fellow, and the prettiest woman's nose is apt to get just a teelle red, when 'the tears come trickling down, down, down.' Oh, Susan, that I should quote that familiar ballad of Lord Lovell when I write of your sorrow! But I suppose there is something of the persifleur in my nature, for I don't often find myself very earnest about anything. And so we walked up and down the esplanade; she crying, and I talking. I flatter myself I talked rather well. There was just that dash of excitement about the business which makes a fellow talk well. But my eloquence was all of no avail; Alfred de Musset, Byron, George Sand, Rousseau, and Thomas Moore, all combined, cannot prevail against the tenets of the Sunday school; and so we are to part, 'in silence and tears, half broken-hearted, to sever,' etc., unless I were prepared to sacrifice my prospects, and put the fatal noose about my neck.

"Bah! it would be too absurd, too utterly preposterous. Such things have been, and have always resulted in pretty much the same way. Your poet Shelley gets expelled from the university because he can't keep his convictions to himself, marries simple rustic maiden, grows tired of her, and falls in love with some one else, whereon rustic maiden drowns herself, whence unspeakable eslandre and confusion.

"January 2nd.—No, the thing cannot be done, the sacrifice would be too great. The days of the Minerva press are past. The yellow post-chaise, the lonely country inn, the college friend who is introduced in a surplice, and acts as clergyman—alas! are not these exploded with the dark ages? Were there ever any such marriages, I wonder? or were they only figments of the romancer's brain? At any rate, anything of that kind must be impossible now-a-days. And then a man must be a consummate scoundrel who could devise such a plot. I don't pretend to the Sunday school species of morality; but nemo repente fuit turpissimus, as Juvenal has it. I am not so bad as that.

"5th.—She is very unhappy; and how hard it seems to leave her to this drudgery and desolation—Coltonslough, and my landlady, and my landlady's children, all the year round! And she is just 'the creature, not too bright or good,' etc.; the very woman, of all others, for a cottage in the lake districts, or a Devonshire fishing village, or any pretty out-of-the-way haven, where a man might take his rest. And yet I must leave her here, baffled entirely by the Sunday school precepts with which her shallow mind has been endowed. I have no time to play the Lovelace, and I don't want such a victory as his. I have had tiresome letters from home. They will expect me to get my degree, and I am free to confess that my reading since I have been at Coltonslough has been the merest moonshine. Decidedly I must leave this place by to-night's express. 'Better to die by sudden shock,' etc.; and as for Susan, it is only a natural chapter in such a girl's history. She will break her heart, and then marry a small tradesman, who will give her a Paisley shawl and a black silk gown to wear on Sundays.

"6th.—Another day, and I am still here. I was awake all last night, thinking of all manner of possibilities, or perhaps impossibilities. The yellow post-chaise and the college friend in a surplice are obsolete absurdities; but how about a marriage before the registrar? Is there anything so very impossible in a marriage before the registrar—which shall not be, say, too binding? Why not a marriage before the registrar, between eight and twelve in the forenoon, with open doors, in the presence of two witnesses, etc., etc.? You walk into an office very much like any other office, and you see an official very much like any other official, and there is a trifling formula, and a little signing and countersigning, and so on, and the business is done. But even about this there would be a good deal of trouble, and the college friend would still be necessary, though not in a surplice—and the witnesses—and the office. Is the game worth the candle? Am I really so desperately in love? And then, again, supposing the game worth the cost of illumination, these sort of games are so apt to be dangerous; and awkward stories crop up against one in after life; with perhaps Chancery suits, and so forth. No, it is too much trouble. It will be better for Susan and I to shake hands, like sensible people, and say Good-by.

"7th.—A very long talk with Susan. I told her that we must part, our roads in life lying separate, and so on. Poor child! her grief was something very terrible. We had wandered out to some lonely ground beyond the esplanade, leaving those abominable children to disport themselves as they pleased. We sat down on a little bank at the edge of a great ploughed field, with the gray sea before us. The poor child sobbed as if her heart would have broken. I am no deliberate Lovelace, but I suppose I have in this instance pursued the prey with something of a Mexican trapper's intensity. I never meant to be in earnest; but have been drifted, as it were, by the chances of the situation; and people who let lodgings at dull water-places really should not employ such pretty parlor-maids. Poor, tender-hearted little Susie! I never thought she could have grown so fond of me, or that a little sentimental spouting and a few pretty speeches could have gone so far. I should have been a callous wretch if I had not been touched by her grief; and I was inexpressibly touched; so much so that I flung all good resolutions to swell the general heap of paving material for the halls of Pluto; and told my Susie that there was an alternative for this miserable parting, if she would—trust me—and consent to a marriage before the registrar.

"She will trust me. I explained to her the nature of the ceremony! I proposed, and how all unnecessary publicity and the ruin of my prospects might be avoided thereby. And then the poor little thing burst out with a whole string of romantic protestations.

"Did she want me to sacrifice my prospects? Oh no, no! Did she want to be acknowledged before the world as my wife? No, a thousand times. She knew very well that she was too ignorant and humbly educated to support such an honor. She only wanted to know herself that she was my wife, my own lawful wife, united to me by the laws of heaven and earth.

"The laws of heaven and earth as administered in a registrar's office. I have cast prudence to the winds, and am now committed to the step which I only dreamed of as a possibility last night.

"I have a sort of foreboding that the business will bring me into trouble; but having gone so far now, am I to recede? and then I am really desperately in love with this Cornish girl.

"How is it to be done? These things seem so simple when one contemplates them in a dreamy reverie engendered by tobacco smoke. It will be rather a complicated business, I fear; and the college friend, that is the grand question. Who is to be the convenient college friend? Perhaps I'd better sleep upon it.

"8th.—After a world of serious consideration I can think of no one but my brother. He's a selfish beggar, who'd scarcely wet the tips of his fingers to save an entire ship's crew from drowning; but he owes me money, and ought to go through fire and water to serve me. At any rate, he is not troubled by any scruples or compunctions of the Sunday school order; and then he's a clever fellow, and on the spot. I'll go up to town to-morrow, and sound him about it."

There was no more. The journal ended here, and Francis Tredethlyn sat staring at the last half-page, sorely puzzled as to how he was to read that broken history.

That the lines before him had been written by a heartless profligate he could scarcely doubt, little as he had been accustomed to sit in judgment upon his fellow-men. But he was slow to understand the full measure of the writer's depravity. A more subtle mind than his was required to read the hidden meaning of that carelessly written diary. Francis Tredethlyn only understood that his cousin had fallen into the hands of a selfish worldling, who had been fascinated by her pretty face, but who set his own welfare and his own happiness before all thought of her love or sorrow.

"He meant to marry her," thought the young man; "thank Heaven for that. No matter how secret or clandestine the marriage may have been, it shall be my task to find Susan, and to make that marriage public."

Mr. Tredethlyn went early the next day to Gray's Inn, there to hold solemn consultation with the chief of that firm which had transacted all Oliver Tredethlyn's legal affairs during a period of some forty years.

To Mr. Kursdale, Francis told all that he had been able to discover of his cousin Susan's history; and to the lawyer's hands he confided the manuscript volume surrendered to him by Mrs. Burfield.

"You'll be able to make more out of it than I can, Mr. Kursdale," he said. "Heaven knows I read it carefully; but I can only understand that the man is a scoundrel, and that it was my cousin's evil fortune to love him. I wonder how it is that a simple, innocent country girl always does fall in love with a scoundrel, if he has only got a handsome face and a smooth tongue?"

The next day was Saturday, and Francis Tredethlyn's thoughts were strangely divided between the contemplation of his cousin's unknown wrongs and the expectation of a day in the sunny gardens and drawing-rooms at the Cedars. Late in the evening there came a letter from Mr. Kursdale, the solicitor:

YOURSELF AND ANOTHER.

"DEAR SIR—After a very careful perusal of the MS. volume entrusted to me by you yesterday, I regret to say that I can only come to one conclusion respecting the intentions of the writer.

"I believe that it was this person's design to involve Miss Susan Tredethlyn in a fictitious marriage, which should be in fact no marriage at all.

"A marriage before the Registrar would have been as entirely valid as duly performed, as any religious solemnization.

"I conclude, therefore, that the writer of the MS. diary contemplated a sham ceremony, in the presence of some person falsely representing himself to be the Superintendent Registrar.

"I much fear that your cousin's simplicity would render her likely to be the dupe of any such plot.

"Should you wish to communicate with me further on this subject, I shall be glad to wait upon you at any time you may appoint.

"I am, dear Sir, yours very obediently,

"JAMES KURSDALE."

"A mock marriage!" thought Francis Tredethlyn. "Yes, I understand it all now. There was an insolence in his manner of writing that stung me to the very heart. No honest man ever wrote like that of any woman; no man would write like that of a woman whom he meant to make his wife."

CHAPTER XIII.

CAUGHT IN THE TOILS.

FRANCIS TREDETHLYN spent the bright summer Sunday afternoon and evening at the Cedars. Mr. Hillary generally filled his house with company on the day of rest; and hard-working magnates, and lazy West End loungers, were alike glad to spend their Sabbath amongst the flower-beds and trellised walks, under the shadow of black-spreading cedars, or on the terrace by the river. The merchant's house was only another "Star and Garter," where the menu was always irreproachable, and where one escaped that little bugbear so common to the close of all social entertainments, and known by the common name of "Bill." Mr. Tredethlyn found the house full of strangers, and Miss Hillary very difficult of approach. He was not allowed to feel embarrassed, however, for Julia Desmond always happened to be in his neighborhood, and he found her society as charming as on the previous occasion. She was so very handsome, and there was really something so bewildering about her dark eyes and white teeth, and fluent talk upon every possible subject, that the young man—who had never been accustomed to the society of well educated women—may be forgiven if he admired her. He admired her, but not as he admired Maude Hillary. No thrill of half-fearful rapture stirred his pulses as he stood by Julia's side upon the moonlit terrace, looking down at the rippling water, darkened by the tremulous shadows of the trees; but the faintest flutter of Maude's airy flounces stirred his soul like a burst of music.

But she was only a beautiful, far-away creature, who never could have any part in his destiny. He acknowledged this in a half-despairing way, and then resigned himself to look at her only now and then from a distance, and to behold her always surrounded by those elegant amber-whiskered loungers, whose admiration of her loveliness never made them awkward in her presence; who could approach her without suffering from a sudden determination of blood to the head; who could hover near her without trampling half a yard of her lace flounce to destruction under the savage tread of a clumsy foot.

"Those fellows are fit to talk to her," he thought. "They've been brought up to it, I suppose; but I'm better out of her way, for even if she speaks to me I make a fool of myself somehow, and feel as if I couldn't answer her. I get on better with Miss Desmond; she's so kind, and she doesn't seem to mind my being awkward and stupid."

Yes, Miss Desmond was very kind to the simple-hearted Cornishman. So kind is Madame Arachne to a big, blundering, blue-bottle fly that hovers ignorantly about the net she has spread for him. Julia had angled very patiently for the last two years in the great matrimonial fisheries, and had brought several fish to land, only to lose her hook and leave them to gasp and perish on the bank when she discovered their quality. But now, for the first time, she knew she had a prey worthy her skill and patience. She had taken good care to ascertain that Francis Tredethlyn's thirty thousand a year was no mere figment of a gossip's brain, and she set herself deliberately to work to win this prize so newly offered for competition in the matrimonial markets. Mr. Hillary interested himself in the young man's fortunes, and gave him some advice about the management of some of his uncle Oliver's numerous investments. This, of course, necessitated interviews at the merchant's offices in Moorgate street, and no interview ever came to a close until Francis had received hospitable Mr. Hillary's invitation to "run down" to Twickenham.

The young man seemed always running down to the Cedars. He slept there sometimes, in a pretty chintz-curtained chamber, all rosebuds and maplewood, and from whose jessamine-festooned windows he looked out upon the river—the perpetual river, now shimmering in the moonlight, now twinkling and glancing in the sunshine, but always "a thing of beauty and a joy" for the people who dwell upon its banks.

Yes, he was always riding down to the Cedars. He had departed very little from his simple habits, but he had bought a couple of horses at Tattersall's, such horses as a man who has been used to ride across wild moorland districts without saddle or stirrups from his earliest boyhood knows how to choose. He kept the horses at livery near his hotel, and he hired a smart young groom to attend to them, and even to ride behind him on occasions.

Miss Hillary grew accustomed to the young man's presence, and greeted him kindly when he came; but then she had so many friends, such enthusiastic female adorers in crisp muslins, who found the millionaire's daughter the dearest darling in the world, and were always eager to pour some new confidence into her willing ears. She had so many friends, so many admirers, that Francis Tredethlyn always found her more or less difficult of approach. And, in the meanwhile, there was Miss Desmond perpetually smiling upon him, and talking to him, and listening to him.

So things went on very pleasantly for Mr. Tredethlyn until one day his eyes were very suddenly opened to a fact that well-nigh overpowered him. He was lounging on the terrace one sunny afternoon, and, for a wonder, Julia Desmond was not by his side. She had been summoned into the midst of a conclave of pretty girls holding solemn discussion with Maude Hillary on the lawn. Francis was looking down at the water, as it was his habit to do, and thinking. He was leaning against the balustrade of the terrace, all amongst the foliage which had been so bright when he had first come to the Cedars, but which was brown and withered now: he was watching the dead leaves slowly drifting in the wind and dropping one by one into the water, and he was thinking of his cousin Susan. Nothing had yet come of his search for her. Perhaps he had left the matter too much in the hands of his lawyers, trusting to their legal acumen for the unravelment of the tangled skein. It may be that he had been a little too much at the Cedars, absorbed in the delights of a new existence. This afternoon, watching the drifting leaves upon the river, the gold and crimson tints of autumn on the woodland and the hill-side, Francis Tredethlyn remembered how the time had slipped by him, and how little nearer he was to the discovery of Susan Tredethlyn's fate than when he had listened to Martha's story in the dreary Cornish grange, and had sworn to go to the end of the world in search of his cousin. There was some feeling of remorse in his mind as he thought of the past three months, the idle days in that luxurious river-side retreat, the billiard-playing and cigar-smoking, the pleasant rides to and fro in the dewy evenings, with genial, gentlemanlike companions, who thought him a good fellow, and very rarely laughed at his ignorant simplicity.

He was roused from his reverie now by one of these young men, Mr. Montagu Somerset, of the War Office, the scion of a noble house, the presumptive heir to nothing a year, and one of the most hopelessly devoted of Maude Hillary's adorers.

"Why, Tredethlyn," exclaimed the young man, without removing a gigantic cigar from between his lips, "how dismally you're staring at that water! It looks as if you were contemplating felo de se, b'Jove. What's the row, old boy? and how do you happen to be alone? Where's the fiancée?"

"I—I was thinking of some family matters, not very pleasant ones," Mr. Tredethlyn answered, simply.

"But where's the future?"

"The what?"

"The future—Mrs. Francis Tredethlyn that is to be—the Desmond. Why, has the lovely Julia deserted her Frank? Why, you dear, simple old baby, how you blush! Is it a crime to be in love with a handsome girl? I only wish your young affections had fixed themselves on one of my five sisters—all most amiable girls, but without so much as a spoonful of what our lively neighbors call potage."

Francis Tredethlyn stared aghast at the young official.

"Why, you don't suppose—you don't think that I—that Miss Desmond—that—"

"You know those silversmiths on the Boulevards—No, you don't know Paris, by-the-by—Well, dear boy, there are Parisian silversmiths who make a great display in their shop windows by means of a concatenation of table-spoons and a strong flare of gas; but I doubt if in all Paris there was ever such a notorious case of spoons as the present, and I don't blame you, my dear Tredethlyn. If I were not Alexander I would be the other person. If I were not madly and hopelessly in love with blue-eyed Maude, I should fling myself at the feet of dark-eyed Julia; such teeth, and such a generally regal turnure, with thirty thousand a year, ought to make a sensation. Frank, I congratulate you! Bless you, my boy, and be happy!" Mr. Somerset wrung his friend's hand with effusion.

"But, my dear Somerset—but, upon my word and honor," cried Mr. Tredethlyn, in extreme terror and perplexity, "Miss Desmond has been very kind to me, and feeling myself out of place here, I've been very grateful for kindness; but, as I am an honest man, not one word has ever passed between us upon any but the commonest subjects, and am sure that neither she nor I have the slightest idea of—"

"Oh, you haven't, eh?" asked Montagu Somerset, taking his cigar from his mouth, and staring at him in a contemplative manner, as he knocked away the ash; "never mind about Miss Desmond; you haven't any idea of making her mistress of yourself and your property, real and personal, eh? You admire her very much, and are very grateful to her being civil to you, and so on, but you have no idea of making her an offer of marriage?"

"No more than I have of making you such an offer."

"Then, in that case," replied Mr. Somerset, deliberately, "all I have to say is to this effect—look out for squalls; when you are coasting on a shore renowned for its quicksands, you'd better beware of any strange light you may see ahead, for the illumination generally means danger. When you meet with such a girl as the Desmond, don't trifle with her; of course it's very pleasant to ride, and drive, and play billiards, and loiter through a summer month or so with a handsome girl, meaning nothing serious all the time; and it is to be done with impunity, if you're careful in your selection of the young lady. But I don't think Julia Desmond is exactly the sort of girl you should try it on with. There are men in our place, apoplectic old fogies in starched neckcloths and no end of waistcoat, who knew the Desmond's father; he was a south of Ireland man and a notorious duellist. They say Julia inherits his eyes and teeth."

"But you don't mean to say that I've done Miss Desmond any wrong?" cried Francis. "How should I be otherwise than grateful to her when she was kind to me, and set me at my ease somehow, and made me feel a little less like an Ojibbeway Indian suddenly let loose amongst fashionable people? How should I imagine that she would think of me except as—as Miss Hillary thinks of me?" His voice grew low, and an inexpressible change came over his whole manner as he mentioned Maude Hillary's name. "They know my history, and that this time last year I was a private in a foot regiment, with nothing higher to hope for than an extra stripe upon my sleeve."

"Miss Hillary is one person, and Miss Desmond is another," Mr. Somerset replied, with just the least suspicion of hauteur. "The lovely Julia's face is her fortune, you know, dear boy. You ask me if you've been wrong; and I tell you frankly, as a gentleman, that I think you have. A man can't be exclusive in his attentions to a woman without other people perceiving the fact, and forming their own conclusions thereupon. I know every one who comes here regards the matter as settled, and I heard Maude say the other day that she thought you a very good fellow—she didn't say fellow—and would be delighted to see her dear Julia so pleasantly established."

"Did she say that?" cried Francis, with a dusky blush kindling under his dark skin; "did she speak well of me? And if—if she should think I have done Miss Desmond some kind of wrong by usurping her society and setting people talking about us—if she should think me mean or base—"

Montagu Somerset interrupted Mr. Tredethlyn by a long whistle.

"Oh, the wind's in that quarter, is it?" he exclaimed, "you're down in that list; then in that case I've nothing more to say. The river flows at your feet, my dear friend, and I dare say there's a rope for sale somewhere in the villages of Twickenham or Isleworth."

The young man sauntered away leaving Francis with his arms folded on the balustrade, and his face darker than it had been, even when he had thought remorsefully of his missing cousin.

Miss Desmond had not made such very bad use of her time. With consummate tact she had contrived to detain Francis Tredethlyn at her side in all those pleasant walks, and drives, and boating excursions, which made up a great part of life at the Cedars: and it seemed that the young man, of his own option, devoted himself to Colonel Desmond's daughter. Julia had been clever enough to set the simple Cornishman entirely at his ease in her presence, and having done that, all the rest followed naturally enough. It was to Miss Desmond that Francis Tredethlyn confided his opinions upon every subject; it was to Miss Desmond that he applied for enlightenment when his ignorance fenced him about with cloud and darkness, and seemed to shut him out from the people around him. When the visitors at the Cedars were busy in the animated discussion of some new book whose name Francis had never heard, and whose contents would have been utterly beyond his untrained understanding, Julia would explain to him the nature of the volume, simplifying the subject with a dexterity that was all her own, but never humiliating her companion by any display of her own superiority. If art was the subject of discussion, Julia insidiously demonstrated to the Cornishman the merits and demerits of any given picture; so Francis Tredethlyn had been considerably benefited by three months of intimacy with a handsome and accomplished woman, and he began to feel something like a well-disposed Maori who had been admitted into familiar intercourse with a family of friendly settlers.

But all this time, in spite of handsome, dark-eyed Julia's kindness, in spite of all the benefits to be derived from intimate relationship with such agreeable people as the guests who were always to be found at Twickenham, the one charm that had held the young man constant to the Cedars, like some spell-bound knight in a fairy story, who cannot leave an enchanted castle, though he knows that peril and ruin lurk within its walls, the one supreme influence that had taken possession of Francis Tredethlyn had been the presence of Maude Hillary. From first to last his faith had never wavered, but his devotion had been the servile worship of an idolater, who was prepared to find his divinity hard and merciless. No thought of ever being anything nearer to Maude Hillary than he now was entered the young man's mind. She was beautiful, amiable, loving—for had he not seen her with her father? She was all that was lovely and adorable in womankind; but she was not for him. In her presence his ignorance and awkwardness seemed to weigh him down to the very dust, and yet she was never unkind to him, or supercilious, or insolent. She was only indifferent: but oh the bitterness of her indifference! the anguish of the slavish worshipper who prostrates himself before his idol, and knows all the while that it is stone, and cannot have pity for him! Again and again Francis Tredethlyn had determined that he would come no more to the Cedars. He would call on Mr. Hillary in the City some morning, and thank him for his hospitable kindness; and then he would buy a commission in a cavalry regiment newly ordered for Indian service.

"Why should I be always coming here?" he thought, "They're all very good to me, the young swells. But I feel awkward amongst them still; and even if I could fall into their ways and make myself like them, which I can't, where would be the good? I don't want to be a 'swell'; I should like to be a soldier, with a regiment of glorious fellows to call me Captain; or a farmer, with half a county to ride over, and a thousand sturdy laborers to take wages from me on a Saturday night; or a merchant, like Mr. Hillary, with a small fleet of ships on the high seas. That sort of thing would be life. But to dawdle in a billiard-room, or lounge at Tattersall's, and buy a horse one doesn't want, out of sheer idleness, and sell him at a loss three weeks afterwards, or to go for a yachting excursion off the Isle of Wight, with men to do all the work, and nothing to do one's self except lie on one's back and smoke and drink pale all day long—I can't fancy such a life as that. So why should I come here any more? I can't fall naturally into these people's habits. I think sometimes that I was happier out yonder, brushing the captain's clothes and talking to the convicts. What a fellow that Surly Bill was! By Jove! that man had seen life!"

Mr. Tredethlyn, lounging perpetually in the gardens by the river, conscious of his incapability of breaking the spell that bound him, thought, with some touch of envy, of the brilliant career of his late acquaintance, Surly Bill, the briglar. But now the Cornishman had been all at once aroused from the pleasant torpor which had crept upon him in this modern Castle of Indolence. All that was most generous in the young man's nature arose in revolt against the thought that he had wronged Julia Desmond. "It seems so hard that she should have set these people talking about by her kindness to an ignorant fellow like me. It must do a girl harm to have her name bandied about by an idle young fellow like Somerset. And she stands alone in the world, too, with no father or brother to take her part. I ought to have told that fellow to hold his tongue, and I will, too, before I leave this house to-night. But this decides me, at any rate. I've been here too much; I'll buy a commission and go out to India, and the lawyers must look after poor little Susie."

IN England by means of the telegraph giving the state of the weather at all points, they are able to foretell the weather. Admiral Fitzroy has this duty imposed upon him. He sits in his office near London, and every morning receives detailed telegraphic reports from all prominent points regarding all the meteorological phenomena of the day, and combining them he is enabled to predict with great accuracy the weather for the next day, or for the next few days. This he does and telegraphs his prediction back for the guidance of mariners. Two days before the late gales which were so destructive to shipping on the English coast, the Admiral predicted their appearance from the north; the storm-flag was hoisted, and all precautions taken. Sometimes, of course, he is mistaken, but as a general thing he is surprisingly correct. But that he can do this, is certainly one of the great triumphs of modern meteorological science.

BENEFICIAL INFLUENCE OF TEA.—The beneficial results of the introduction of tea and coffee have been strangely overlooked or underrated. It has been, however, well described as leading "to the most wonderful change that ever took place in the diet of modern civilized nations—a change highly important both in moral and physical point of view. These beverages have the admirable advantage of affording stimulus without producing intoxication or any of its evil consequences. Lovers of tea and coffee are, in fact, very seldom drinkers; and hence the use of these beverages has benefited both manners and morals. Raynal observes that the use of tea has contributed more to the sobriety of the Chinese than the severest laws, the most eloquent discourses, or the best treatises on morality. Tea is so little drunk in Germany, that it acts like medicine when taken by a native; and persons decline a cup of good bohea, with "No, I thank you; I am quite well at present."

CONCERNING A BALL.

[Ladies, who are always interested in everything appertaining to dancing and dresses, will be delighted with the following letter relative to a private entertainment which has suddenly become a topic of public comment. The letter is from one young lady to a friend at a distance, and being kindly permitted the privilege, we publish it verbatim, merely omitting the names of the wearers of the toilettes described, it seeming to us bad taste, under the circumstances, to even indicate them by initials. It will be understood that the writer was not writing for publication, and probably only mentioned the dresses of mutual friends, and those which were notable for novelty. If it be found that the French terms used, are in all cases misprinted, it must be remembered that our acquaintance with the language does not extend to toilette technicalities and that a dictionary for the use of people unacquainted with millinery has not yet been published—consequently it is quite possible that our proof reader has been in some instances at fault.]

SAN FRANCISCO, WEDNESDAY, JAN. 25th, 1865.

MY DEAR LAURA.—Not a word from you since the great black steamer with its ugly pipes—puffing away like those impertinent fellows who don't take their cigars out of their mouths in the presence of ladies but insist on poisoning the clear pure air with their villainous smoke—bore you away from the wharf, and yet I, mindful of my promise, have written you regularly, not omitting the slightest detail that could interest you, and robbing my admirers of much time that otherwise would have been devoted to their entertainment and my own amusement. Oh Laura, Laura! I much fear that New York with its gayeties and pleasures has made you forget "the girl you left behind you," and of whom you carried away countless pictures as well as the choicest tress that her back hair afforded. Now this might be pardonable in a man, who always has a right to forget first loves and last promises, but in one of our sex—a sex which has been praised for its constancy in both prose and poetry since the day when Eve insisted on accompanying Adam in his flight from Eden—this, Laura, is too much, and I wonder at you.

The truth of the matter is, I should wreak a woman's revenge upon you for your neglect by never speaking and much less writing to you again, if there were not a possibility that the mails are at fault—as males very often are—and that the letters directed to me in your pinny boarding-school handwriting have gone straggling off to the Sandwich Islands or to some other out of the way place, where I am confident that no one could read them, however familiar with the English language they might be, without me to act as interpreter—though I am not confident that now even my assistance would avail to unravel the meaning of your closely written and crossed and recrossed manuscript, so long is it since I have had an opportunity of puzzling myself over one of your letters.

If I did not put this charitable interpretation upon your silence I should not write you now; though, after having told you about all the other affairs that have taken place since you left, it would be really unkind of me to disappoint your laudable curiosity in regard to what, beyond question, has proved the most brilliant entertainment ever given in this country. Now be patient, dear, for already I can fancy that your little mouth is rippling with: What was it? who were there? what did they wear? quick, tell me! You know I never could bear to be hurried, and once broke off an engagement merely because the "object of my affections" (that's the word, isn't it?) always stood on the stairs when we were going anywhere calling out, "Quick, Minnie! are you not ready yet?" making me so nervous that I invariably tore my gloves, and once went out into the street with the edge of my jupe showing for a full inch below my dress—and that was before they took to looping dresses up expressly to let embroideries be seen.

You know how I love dancing, and you know, too, that I can't help it, for the first note of music sets me wild. It sometimes seems to me that there must be little cords tied to my bottines, and that the musicians know this, and cunningly contrive to get hold of them just to amuse themselves with me, for, the very moment that they begin to play, my feet begin to pat the floor, and never stop until the music does. And then do you know it seems somehow as though I was let down from some great height with a suddenness almost amounting to a fall, and I look around, startled, tired and bruised with the feeling that melody has died, never to be revived, with the last cadence that is floating away on the air and that I can never be happy again. It is so positively painful to me that I sometimes wish the winds were always playing waltzes and galops, and that we might dance about the house and through the streets instead of walking—I am confident that under such circumstances I should never ride.

Knowing this, you will know the mingled apprehension and delight with which I heard that the wife of the Commanding General of the Department, lately come among us, intended to give a reception which would probably resolve itself into a ball, for we had had so many balls already, and there was such a terrible talk about "hard times" that I thought the season was over, that everything was aufgespielt, and there would be no more dancing for me until we meet at Saratoga—where you know you have promised to join me in June. Besides, I did not know either the General or his wife, and papa belongs to a different party in politics, so it seemed very doubtful whether we would get an invitation or not. As far as I'm concerned, you know I don't know or care much about politics anyway, though as I am always ready to attach myself to any party where music and dancing are expected, I cannot say that I am not moved by party-spirit once and awhile. But even if I were a politician, and a maker of stump speeches besides, I think I should adopt the principle of that charming mutual friend of ours who said that she never let politics interfere with her pleasures—that would be my motto unless I were a real live pelican, with a great ugly pouch under my mouth that made me ashamed to be seen anywhere where every one else hadn't the ugly pouch, too.

So you may imagine my delight when an invitation was received, and papa said I might go and he would accompany me. I asked him if he intended to ride one of the brooms that they carried in the last election, or go in a carriage, and he laughed and said he guessed he'd go in the same wheelbarrow that some one wheeled another McClellan man in from one end of the town to the other. I asked him what I should wear, and he laughed at the idea, for you know he always calls me his little "woman in white," declaring, when we were talking about the late Fancy Ball, of which I wrote you, that he thought I could sustain that character better than any other, as I had rehearsed it at every party I ever attended in my life, as well as when I was a baby. So, white was determined upon; papa wanted me to wear the pearls that uncle gave me at Christmas, but I told him that since the frost flowers had become so valuable that I thought a white rosebud in my hair would be rarer and attract more attention than any other ornament that could be devised, and he let me have my own way—you know he can't help it, for when I am doing just as I want to I contrive to persuade him that it is he that wants me to do so and that he is having his own way. I think I shall try to manage my husband somewhat in that fashion, if ever I have one, for it must save a great deal of trouble and bother.

The invitations were for nine o'clock "Tuesday evening, the 24th inst.," and we started at ten, for papa says it is worse to be too late than too early. It is only ten minutes' drive from our house to the Occidental Hotel, and we got there in good season, so that when presented to our hostess and host we had time to interchange a few pleasant words with them instead of merely shaking hands and passing on. The whole of the first floor of the hotel had been given up for the occasion, and an usher conducted us down the hall to a small room connected with the ladies' parlor, which latter was the reception room. Here we were announced by the usher, and Mrs. McDowell received us, presenting us to her husband, who stood by her side. The General is such a stately, dignified gentleman, that I felt somewhat afraid of meeting him, for the probabilities were he had heard that our family were rebels and traitors, just because father voted for McClellan, and that he ought to send us to Alcatraz the moment we entered the room; but Mrs. McDowell's pleasant smile and manner reassured me at once, and when she took my hand and presented me to her husband, the General, I felt that neither of them thought that we ought to have no home in California because we once had one in the South. The General recognized papa at once, and said that he met him in Kentucky a great many years ago, long, long before the war broke out, and spent a very pleasant time at his plantation; and during the course of the evening they had quite a talk together about the prospects of peace and the necessity of prudence and discretion in averting outbreaks and civil war out here. Of course I don't understand such things much, but it seems to me that a few years ago Northern and Southern people were good friends enough, and interchanged visits together and thought a good deal of each other, and that neither has changed so much in four years as some people would have us believe. It is very curious to me to hear both parties calling each other thieves and murderers, and everything else that is bad, when a few years ago either of them would have knocked a foreigner down for saying half as much about the other. And I don't see what the newspapers say they are fighting for "Union" for, when in the same breath they declare and maintain and repeat that the people with whom they are fighting are cowards, and robbers, and ought every one to be swept from the face of the earth. I, for my part, think that these newspapers do a great deal of harm, and that if they were kept away from the people on both sides, the war would be ended a great deal sooner than it will be if they are allowed to go on, at both the North and South, persuading the people on both sides that those opposed to them are of a different flesh and blood and are guilty of such enormities that the earth ought to open and swallow them.

You must not think that all this talk took place at the door of the reception room, for we moved on almost immediately, though I noticed that a good many others instead of doing this stood talking in the doorway, blocking it up until papa said they ought to have another usher to pull them away.

The supper was served in one of the halls, shut off from the main one by a rich brocade curtain, the dining room having been cleared of its tables and fitted up for dancing. There were so many large mirrors in the room that some one said it was evident the General didn't care how many reflections were cast upon his party, and there was a great profusion of flowers, notwithstanding their cost—flowers everywhere, over the mirrors and under them, and festooning the chandeliers, with canary birds hung up in cages at every place, it seemed to me, where there was a chance to hang one. I have already told you that all of the first floor was given up to the occasion, with several dressing-rooms in the story above, so that though there were four or five hundred guests present there was no crowding, but room for all. Indeed the whole thing was conducted in such a manner that it was the very thing it was intended to be, a private entertainment; and one forgot that it was given in a hotel.

Now, as to what was worn I really am very much at a loss how to tell you, for I always give myself so completely up to the illusion of one of these fairy scenes that memory would fail me even if I attempted to take mental notes. Mrs. McDowell, I remember, wore a white tarlatane, with narrow flounces, trimmed with crimson flowers; her coiffure was of crimson flowers. The General was in plain clothes, of course, all the other officers of the army and navy appearing in full uniform, as well as the Foreign Consuls. A lady whose husband holds the "highest (State) office within the gift of the people," wore a canary moiré with the richest of black flounces and trimmings, revealing the taste of the French couturière in the distribution. All was in harmony, even to the pretty device of the tiny nœud that sparkled with its cluster of diamonds so brilliantly upon the shapely throat it encircled—her hair, dressed in "bouffans" à l'air de sa figure, was surmounted by a crown of pearls and feathers, the bright cerise of the latter enlivening all. I noticed particularly a white satin covered with white crape bouillonnée, with now and then a festoon of the finest chantille, all rendered most bewitchingly elegant by a tunic of blue velour épinglé; this excited the admiration of all who love novelty in ladies' attire. Another lady lately returned from Europe wore light blue silk with white point lace flounce, trimmed en tablière, with shawl to correspond; the dress was made more elegant, if possible, by the dignity of the wearer, and on all sides ladies were descending upon the richness of her laces and the magnificence of her attire. More beautiful matrons are seldom seen. Our friend who "never allows politics to interfere with her pleasures" wore a corn-colored taffeta, cut goring and fitting à merveille, trimmed with chantille, she as usual adopting the style which seems especially to become her. One lady appeared with her hair powdered, looking like a graceful Marquise of the old regime, attracting much notice. A lady from the distant town of San Jose wore a white moiré with two rows of black lace—I'm afraid to tell you what the dress cost, for it would startle you. One of the Consuls' ladies wore a magnificent dress of rose moiré flounced en riche point d'Angleterre. The wife of our old friend, the present Commanding General's predecessor, wore black velvet, her coiffure of blue velvet and white feathers. One dress pleased me exceedingly; it was of white moiré antique, as simple and yet as elegant a toilette as there was in the room. The magnificent lady whom we have so often admired, and of whom you once remarked that a line in Marco Bozaris seemed especially written to tempt gentlemen to quote it to her, wore a white moiré trimmed with white crape dotted with velvet flowers and sprays, her hair the same, no ornament but her own massive hair, confined with a golden comb. But it is useless to attempt to describe all the toilettes. Never were there seen together in this city so many beautiful women in such costly silks, satins, velvets, laces—tulle, crape, illusion, tarlatane, etc. In colors, red, white and yellow prevailed among the richest dresses, while among the young ladies nearly all the thin fabrics were in white—one dress I remember particularly, it was so fresh and gossamer like, a pure white devoid of ornament; not even a flower or feather ever so tastefully arranged could have added to the costume, but might have diminished the effect of true simplicity. Do not say "That's you, Minnie!" for it isn't.

Now, ma chère, if you wish to know what else was worn, and by whom, you must get some one else to tell you, for it was nearly three o'clock last night before we left the ball-room, and I can hardly hold my poor sleepy head up even now. Or, perhaps I'll send you a newspaper, for I suppose the editors will bore friends who were not at the ball until they learn, in a confused way, what everybody wore, that they may publish each costume—wrongly. Taken all in all, the entertainment was the most brilliant one ever given in this community; and my only regret is that you were not there to share the pleasure with me. For if I enjoy dances, you know that your weakness is suppers, and Mr. Iceland certainly achieved a triumph in that department last evening. Remember me to all my old beaux; be honest in dividing them with me when I come on, and believe me

Tout et toujours à toi,

MINNIE.

MANY complain that they are not appreciated properly simply because they are.

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS.

NOTHING of moment this week. The usual rumors fly from east to west. Peace now, war next. Now the South wants peace—again she doesn't; Sherman is marching on Charleston now—again his main army quietly rests on its laurels in Savannah. Now Wilmington is evacuated—again Bragg holds Gen. Terry and his veterans in check. What is a compiler to do? Fortunately, however, the readers of THE CALIFORNIAN stand on the same footing with us that the boy did with the showman—they pay their money, and can take their choice. We simply tell the story to them as the telegraph tells it to us, fondly waiting and hoping like trustful Micahs for something definite to "turn up." If any phenomenon of the kind does occur, the daily press may possibly distance us in spreading the news before the people, but they cannot get ahead of us in the triumphant joy with which the first "something positive" will be put upon "record."

January 19th.—The mildness of Gen. Sherman's policy in Savannah is increasing the Union sentiment in that city. No restriction is placed upon trade, except in cotton and other articles contraband of war. In Southwestern Georgia, nine counties have issued calls for Union meetings.

Deserters from the rebel lines in front of Petersburg report that ninety-five miles of the railroad between Danville and Greensboro' had been destroyed by heavy rains. Every culvert and bridge had been carried away.

Richmond papers state the negroes are fleeing in gangs into the Yankee lines in apprehension of being conscripted into the rebel army.

The Raleigh (N. C.) Whig comes out openly for reconstruction. It says the interior of North Carolina is filled with deserters and outlaws, and the State militia have thrown away their arms and gone home.

Resolutions of thanks to Admiral Porter and his officers and men, as well as Major General Terry and his officers and men, for their conduct at Fort Fisher, passed the Senate unanimously.

January 21.—Charleston despatches in the Richmond papers, under date of January 15th, give particulars of Sherman's advance towards Charleston. The Fifteenth and Seventeenth Corps, with little artillery or baggage, advanced from Beaufort, while Gen. Sherman was moving by railroad with the remainder of his army, artillery, trains, etc. On Saturday the Fourth and Seventh Corps, under Maj.-Gen. Blair, crossed Port-Royal ferry, and with a portion of Foster's command, moved on Pocatolgo. Gen. Howard, commanding that wing of the army, reported on Sunday that the enemy abandoned his strong works in our front during Saturday night. Blair's corps now occupies a strong position across the railroad, covering all the approaches east of Pocatolgo.
